are spoken of as the same; the latter is expressed and explained by the former. It is said of Christ that He ordained twelve [Mark iii. 14], that is, He chose them to the office of apostleship, as He Himself explains it [John vi. 70]. Paul and Barnabas are said to ordain elders in every Church [Acts xiv. 23], or to choose them; that is, they gave orders and directions to every Church as to the choice of elders over them. The word used in Acts xiv. 23 is translated chosen in 2 Cor. viii. 19, where the Apostle speaks of a brother, who was chosen of the Churches to travel with us, and is so rendered when ascribed to God [Acts x. 41]. This choice and ordination, in primitive times, was made in two ways—by casting lots and giving votes, signified by stretching out of hands. Matthias was chosen and ordained to be an Apostle in the room of Judas by casting lots; that, being an extraordinary office, required an immediate interposition of God, a lot being neither more nor less than an appeal to His decision of an affair. But ordinary officers, such as elders and pastors of Churches, were chosen and ordained by the votes of the people, expressed by stretching out their hands, as in Acts. xiv. 23.

Some, however, on this side of the question, do not go so far as to say that the essence of ordination lies in the choice of the people, but in the solemn and public separation to office by prayer; still, they think that ordination, either by bishops, presbyters, or any superior character, cannot be necessary to make a minister or ordain a pastor in any particular Church; for they argue that Christ would never leave the subsistence of His Churches, or the efficacy of His Word and Sacraments, to depend on the uninterrupted succession of any office or officer, for then it would be impossible after the lapse of centuries for any Church to know whether it had an authentic minister. A whole nation might be corrupted, and every bishop and elder have apostatised from the faith, as it was in England before the Reformation; and to say that the right of ordaining lies in men who are already in office, would drive us to hold the untenable position of uninterrupted succession.

On the other side it is said that, though Christians have the liberty of choosing their own pastors, they have no power or right to confer the office itself. Scripture represents ordination to be the setting apart of a person to the holy ministry by the authority of Jesus Himself, acting by the medium of men in office; and this solemn investing act is necessary to his being lawfully accounted a minister of Christ. The original word [Acts vi. 3] signifies to put one in rule, or to give him authority. How did this power lodge in the people? how happens it that in all the Epistles not a single word is to be found giving them any directions about constituting ministers? On the other hand, in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, who were persons in office, we find particular instruction given them to lay hands suddenly on no man, to examine his qualifications before they ordain him, and to take care that they commit the office only to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also [Titus i. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 14]. Besides, it is said, the early Christians evidently viewed this matter in the same light. There is scarcely a single ecclesiastical writer who does not expressly mention ordination as the work of the elders, and as being regarded as a distinct thing from the choice of the people, and subsequent to it.

Another question involved here is whether a man can be ordained in any other way than as the pastor of a church. In the Roman and Anglican Churches, a man receiving the imposition of hands is regarded as thereby in possession of certain powers, which he may forthwith exercise, or which may lie latent. But others hold that not to entrust with a church is not to ordain. In favour of the former view it is urged that when our Lord gave his commission [Matt. xxviii. 19], He gave no specific church, and that missionaries and itinerants cannot be ordained to particular spheres, but are ordained for the Church Universal. And by analogy we may hold that Titus and other friends of St. Paul were similarly ordained, to find their work afterwards as God might point it out to them. It should be noted that no bishop could ordain a man without title, that is, without knowing distinctly that he was to be appointed to some specific sphere of duty, either as curate of souls, or engaged in education (as fellows of a college), or as missionary.

Organ [Gr. organon].—The word in the LXX. was used for any kind of instrument, but in the Vulgate it is translated as "pipe." In St. Augustine's time it seems to have nearly approached its present meaning, as he speaks of it as an instrument in which wind was supplied by bellows. The pipes were at first generally ten, which were sounded either from a wind-magazine compressed by the arm, or by bellows whose supply was regulated by water. These were used at entertainments, and not allowed in churches, because it was thought that the soft tones spoilt the singing, but when Michael Rhangabe sent an organ to Charles the Great, it was put in Aix-la-Chapelle Cathedral, and at the end of the ninth century Pope John VIII. begged Bishop Anno of Freising to send him an organ and some one who could play it. The keys were added in the eleventh century, and pedals in the fifteenth. The organ has never been used among the Greeks. From the time of Charlemagne organs seem to have come more and more into use in the West, though protests were made against them, and the monks were very averse to their use. At the Reformation they were discarded, being considered

"the vilest remnants of Popery;" were reintroduced at the Council of Trent. They were so disliked by the Puritans in England that at the Restoration scarcely one to be found, and foreign organs brought over to play on those which were.

Concerning the position of the organ in the church, it is noticeable that in some churches it was placed on the north side of the choir, as it is generally at present. The custom of placing it over the choir screen is now far less prevalent than it was a century ago, seems not to have been general till the Restoration. It is still the custom in many churches and cathedrals for the organ to be silent throughout Lent Week, and during Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent.

Oriel School.—This refers to a religious party at Oxford, of which bishop Whately may be regarded as the leader. Other members of it were Copleston, the Provost of the school, and Copleston, the Provost of the school, in fact, Principal Tulloch, as mentioned in an essay on this subject, Movement of Thought during the Nineteenth Century. Copleston "the original master-mind of the movement." He was succeeded as Provost of Oriel, in 1828, by Dr. Hawkins, who lived until 1883, and maintained the traditions of his predecessor. From his foundation the party was joined by Hampden. The school was known as the "Oriel men," from being supposed to possess superior mental independence, and the members of the University regarded them with alarm. The recoil from them was one of the main causes of the Tracts for the Times, started by Newman, another fellow who led an opposing school. [V. HAMPDEN; TRACTS.]

Oriflamme [Lat. ori flamma, "gold flame"]—A banner with three points which had this name given it because it was made of a silken stuff, of a gold colour; the tassels of it were green, and carried on the point of a lance. It belonged originally to the Abbey of St. Denis, and the bearing of this standard was the right of the Earls of Pontenay, who were the protectors of the king. Louis le Gros was the first king who, in his right of Earl of Vex, bore the oriflamme to be carried in battle. Its use as the standard of France continued till the reign of Charles V. after he had ousted the English. He adopted the White Coronet as the emblem of France. The original oriflamme was about 1382. It was kept at St. Denis of peace, and consecrated with money every time it was carried to battle.

Origen, surnamed ADAMANTUS for his unwearied assiduity in writing and ria, A.D. 185. He was the Holy Scriptures by whom he often puzzled questions, showing that and the literal meaning, fanciful interpretations, strongly characterised were followed up under us, and he gained, beside of many other sub-opinions of the various philosophical schools. He was with mathematics and a knowledge of Hebrew, at his time.

At sixteen years old his father entered the persecution under the ardour almost led him indeed, his mother could not join him by The death of Leonides great want, as all his propositions; but they were assisted by the school of Alexandria, who received him into their house. Here he pursued a short time until he was employed by teaching grammar. He abandoned this employment and became a Catechist by the Bishop Theoctistus. In this capacity he lived of great austerity. He was famous for his literature, and lived the last of his days in teaching, of his nights in the study. His zeal sometimes led him, for example, in interpreting Luke 3 and Matt. xix. 12.

He was widely, and the number of his disciples increased so rapidly that he was employed in the instruction of the newer converts, and Heraclas, and devoting his time to those who were converted. Origen did not confine himself to Alexandria. He visited Rome, and at the death of the governor he went to Arabia to preach the Gospel there. During a journey to Palestine, he was elected Bishop of Cæsarea, but his appointment was publicly in the face of the fact that he was then only a layman. His appointment was objected to by Theoctistus, Bishop of Jerusalem. In 202 he was recalled to Alexandria. He was sent for by Mammœa, the mother of Emperor Severus, who was then his nephew, the Emperor, to instruct her in the truths of Christianity. Another time he travelled to various parts to combat heresies which had been introduced. He was ordained priest at the request of Bishop Theoctistus. This led to a serious quarrel between them. The latter, offended within his province, and envious, perhaps, of his subordinate's fame, persuaded a Council of African bishops to degrade him from the priesthood, banish him from Alexandria, and excommunicate him, on the ground that some of his doctrines were unorthodox.

Henceforward, Origen resided at Cæsarea, where he carried on his work of teaching and writing. That the feeling against him was not universal is shown by the fact that he was summoned to attend a Council of Arabian bishops, A.D. 238, at which he confuted the heresy of Beryllus, one of these bishops, respecting the Incarnation, and induced its author to return to the Catholic faith.

In the Decian persecution [A.D. 250] Origen suffered severely. He was imprisoned and tortured, but the martyr's crown which he so eagerly desired was denied him. He died in the reign of Gallus, A.D. 254, aged sixty-nine.

Origen's industry was indefatigable. He is said to have written as many as six thousand volumes; but, if this be true, letters and short treatises, are probably reckoned as volumes. His great work, which occupied twenty-eight years, was his Hexapla, an arrangement in parallel columns of six different versions of the Old Testament. These were:—[1] the Greek version, made by Aquila, in the reign of Hadrian; [2] that of Theodotion, published in the reign of Commodus; [3] that of Symmachus, published in 202; [4] the Septuagint [LXX.] version; and [5 and 6] two anonymous Greek versions. To these he added the Hebrew text in Hebrew and Greek characters. The first four of these versions formed the Tetrapla. These are now, unfortunately, lost. Other writings are:—Commentaries on the greater part of the Bible; Stromata, in which the opinions of the ancient philosophers are compared with Christianity; a work against Celsus consisting of eight books; a treatise to Africanus on the History of Susannah, defending that book; and an Exhortation to Martyrdom, written to his friend Ambrose during the persecution of Maximin, in which the possession of property, wife, and children, is held up as an encouragement, rather than a deterrent, to the martyr, making the merit so much the greater. Origen's character has been the subject of much dispute. The praise which he has received from some is only equalled by the blame which he has received from others. It is only fair to say that his Treatise de Principiis, from which the charges against him are chiefly drawn, is only known to us through the translation of Ruffinus, and the original work has been so much altered by the translator and others, as Ruffinus himself confesses, that there is considerable difficulty in arriving at the author's real opinions.

Original Sin.—The Ninth Article of the Church of England declares against the Pelagians that original sin is not a mere following of Adam by a free agent, but is "the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil." This passage assumes that man was created good and without actual sin, and that this original righteousness was lost by the Fall. But the position taken by modern scientific rationalism comes into collision with this view, for it assumes that man has slowly emerged out of a low physical and moral condition into civilisation, and that the traditions of a golden age are "a poet's dream, a vaunt of empty song."

This much may at once be conceded, that except in the Garden of Eden the Bible gives us no reason to suppose that the earlier inhabitants of the world were more moral or more religious than their successors, and that scientific investigation gives no trace of any but savage peoples. Yet the judgments of God as declared in Scripture are declared on the face of Nature, the soul that sins dies. Races, like individuals, become deteriorated. And thus we are brought to the conclusion that the sins of the fathers really are visited upon the children. But, unlike Nature, the religion of Christ offers hope, because it reveals that the suffering caused by sin is a discipline, that the furnace of affliction separates the dross from the gold, and that the Saviour can put away sin, and will do so in the brighter land whither we are faring. The teaching, not of St. Paul only, but of Christ, distinctly spoke of a new birth in Christ, which shall take away the death which is the heritage of man in his natural state [John iii. 5-8, 36; Rom. vi.]. The latter chapter is throughout the assertion that eternal life is a special gift of God, conferred on those meet to receive it. And this eternal life is the converse of the evil nature which produces what St. Paul calls the works of the flesh. Now, such works—injustice, oppression, lust, sensuality, cruelty—are certainly to be traced back till we find them originating in the promptings of that nature which we have in common with the animal kingdom. To gratify the various desires of the body is the law of the animal, and with this law the spiritual life comes into antagonism. Now the history of Adam and Eve may be poetic in form, but it represents a truth which Nature recognises, namely, that there was a conflict between the lower and the higher nature, in which the higher was defeated. Adam put away from him the supernatural grace which might have saved him, and it is thus with all his posterity. It has been asserted indeed that any interpretation of the Fall as an allegory throws doubt on the descent of mankind from a single pair, and that this is a direct contradiction of 1 Cor. xv. 22. To this it has been replied that inasmuch as the relationship to Christ is a spiritual one, and we are not Christ's sons by descent, there is no proof that our relationship to Adam may not have been regarded by the Apostle as spiritual too.

The doctrine of Original Sin explains the Incarnation of the Lord Jesus. There was a gradual evolution of the spiritual nature from its first beginning, far back in the history of the world. It struggled for existence against foes fierce, mighty, and manifold, yet marvellously preserved. Evil seemed to triumph, yet the good lived and grew. And at last, in the fulness of time, came the Perfect Example, by following Whom, in union with Whom, good is attained and evil cast out.

Origin of Evil. [Sin.]

Ormuzd.—The highest of the gods. His worshippers held that he created the principles both of good and evil, but the doctrine was afterwards degraded. He was looked upon as the representative of evil. Ahriman, the "black god," was chosen as the evil god. [PARSISM.]

Ornaments Rubric.—The rubric refers to the second rubric preceding the Morning and Evening Prayer, which thus:—"And here is to be noted that the ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof at all times of their ministrations be retained and be in use as were in this of England, by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of Edward the Sixth."

This rubric has lately given rise to a deal of controversy with regard to the points, the ornaments of the Church and the vestments of the priest, but particularly the latter, which we will consider first.

[1] In 1549 the rubric referred to was placed at the beginning of the Communion Service, stated that the priest shall wear white albe plain, with a vestment or cope, and the assisting priests or deacons shall wear white tunicles. At the end of the preface ceremonies it was ordered that "in singing of Mattins and Evensong, Mass, and Burying, the minister in parish churches and chapels annexed to the same, shall wear surplice," and that graduates shall, in churches and colleges, use their hood. Whensoever the minister shall celebrate Holy Communion, or execute any other administration, he shall have upon him, his rochette, a surplice or albe, and a vestment. In 1552 it was ordered that the minister at the time of the Communion at all other times in his ministrations use neither albe, vestment, nor cope; but an archbishop or bishop he shall have and wear a rochette; and being a priest or deacon he shall have and wear a surplice only. Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne confirmed the rubric ordered that the ornaments of Orthodoxy [Gr. orthos, “right,” and doxa, “opinion.”]—Inasmuch as no one can arrogate to himself the claim of holding correct opinions on all subjects, it might seem difficult to determine what constitutes orthodoxy. It may be said that those who hold the doctrines of Scripture are orthodox; but as disputes exist as to the interpretation of Scripture this test is hardly sufficient. The Roman Catholic Church holds it heterodox to deny Transubstantiation. Protestants generally would agree to apply it to those who hold the doctrine of the Trinity and the three Creeds.

O Sapientia.—The opening words of the first of the seven antiphons formerly sung during the last week in Advent, except on St. Thomas’s Day and Christmas Eve. They were appointed in the English Liturgy to be sung before the Magnificat, but were discontinued at the Reformation. The following is a translation:—

“Dec. 16. O Sapientia. O Wisdom, which comest out of the mouth of the Most High, reaching from one end to the other, mightily and sweetly ordering all things; come and teach us the way of understanding.

“Dec. 17. O Adonai. O Lord and Ruler of the house of Israel, who appearedst to Moses in a flame of fire in the bush, and gavest him the law in Sinai; come and deliver us with an outstretched arm.

“Dec. 18. O Radix Jesse. O Root of Jesse, which standest for an ensign of the people, at whom kings shall shut their mouths, to whom the Gentiles shall seek; come and deliver us now, tarry not.

“Dec. 19. O Clavis David. O Key of David, and Sceptre of the house of Israel, Thou that openest, and no man shutteth; and shuttest, and no man openeth; come and bring the prisoner out of the prison-house, and him that sitteth in darkness and in the shadow of death.

“Dec. 20. O Oriens. O Day-spring, brightness of the Everlasting Light, and Sun of Righteousness; come and enlighten them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

“Dec. 22. O Rex Gentium. O King and Desire of all Nations, Thou Cornerstone who hast made both one; come and save man whom Thou formedst from the clay.

“Dec. 23. O Emmanuel. O Emmanuel, our King and Lawgiver, Hope of the Gentiles, and their Saviour; come and save us, O Lord our God.”

Osculatory or Osculatorium.—A carving or painting on wood or metal, with a representation of our Saviour, the Virgin, or one of the saints, used in the ancient Church at the celebration of Mass. It was kissed first by the priest and then by the people, to whom he handed it for the purpose. It was probably a remnant of the old custom among Christians in the early Church of interchanging the kiss of peace at the agapæ.

Osiander, ANDREAS.—A German theologian [b. 1498, d. 1552] who embraced the Reformation doctrines, and became a theological teacher at Königsberg. But his doctrine was largely mixed with mysticism; he asserted the doctrine of Justification by Faith, but explained it to mean the infusion into the soul of the Divine nature of Christ. Christ, he said, could not in His human nature only obtain justification for sinners; nor can man be justified by embracing and applying to himself, through faith, the righteousness and obedience of the Man Christ. It is through the essential and eternal righteousness of Christ, the Son of God, which is united to the human nature through the Incarnation, that mankind obtains complete justification. If man had never fallen, the Incarnation would still have taken place to complete the Divine image in human nature. His passionate inculcation of his opinions led to a very sharp controversy, in which Melancthon took part against Osiander; but the death of the latter ended it. His son Lukas was Court Preacher at Stuttgart, and author of a paraphrase on the Bible and other theological works.

Osmund, Sr., Bishop of Salisbury from 1078–1099. He completed the cathedral of Old Sarum. He was of Norman origin, and is said to have been related to the Conqueror, in whose train he came to England and was made Earl of Dorset. He compiled the Consuetudinarium, or Liber Ordinalis, "for the use of Sarum," which is still preserved in Salisbury Cathedral, and remained in use till the Reformation. Many miracles were said to be wrought at his tomb, and at length, in 1456, he was canonised by Calixtus III.

Osterwald, JEAN FRÉDÉRIC [b. 1663, d. 1747], was a pastor in Neuchâtel who wrote many treatises with the object of giving religious life a more practical character; as—A Treatise concerning the Causes of the Present Corruption of Christians, Grounds and Principles of the Christian Religion, Lectures on the Exercise of the Sacred Ministry, etc., all of which have been translated into English and other languages.

Ostiarii.—One of the minor orders of clergy, their duties resembling those of the vergers of modern times. Their duty was to stand at the door and watch that no heathen came in to disturb the service, and to maintain order in the church. The office is mentioned by Cornelius in his letter to Irenæus in the third century. There is still an ostiarius in the Roman Church.

Oswald, Sr., Bishop of Worcester and Archbishop of York. He was descended from an illustrious Danish family, who carried his education to his uncle Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury. By him he was made, first, Prior, and then Dean of Winchester; but, finding it impossible to carry out the reforms which were needed amongst his clergy, he resigned his preferment and went to France, where he remained some time in the Benedictine monastery of Fleury, on the Loire. In 961 he returned to England, and on the recommendation of St. Dunstan, who had succeeded Edgar, made him Bishop of Worcester in the room of Dunstan. Oswald is famous for his reformation of the clergy, and for inducing Dunstan to expel the secular canons, and place them with monks in several dioceses. He built a monastery at Westbury, to which he used himself to retire when able. A new monastery was founded by Ælwin, a relation of King Edgar, at Ramsey, in the fens of Cambridgeshire, and in 972, when it was the reception of monks, twelve were sent thither from Westbury. In 972, on the death of Osketil, Archbishop of York, he was appointed his successor, and at that time he retained the See of Worcester. He got rid of the secular canons by building a new church in honour of the Virgin Mary, and he placed in the hands of monks, and he himself lived in the mass himself there, till gradually the church was deserted, and the last of the ancient clergy took the Benedictine rule, and became prior. He is said to have induced monks into six other churches in his diocese, against the will of the people; however this may have been, it is certain that reform in the churches was needed. St. Oswald died at Worcester and was buried in his cathedral.

Oswald, Sr., King of Northumbria. He was the second son of Ethelfrith, his father being killed by Rædwald, King of East Angles in 617, he was obliged to seek safety with his brothers into Ireland, where he was converted to Christianity and baptised. His uncle Edwin had usurped the throne, but in 633 he was slain in battle with Penda, King of the Mercians, and Eanfrith, Oswald's elder brother, succeeded him; but was slain the next year by the treachery of Cædwalla, King of the Britons. Oswald then marched against Cædwalla and defeated him, and became King of Northumberland. He at once sent for missionaries, and procured some from the island of St. Columba; one of that number, was made Bishop of York in the room of Paulinus, who had died on King Edwin's death, and the See was transferred from York to Lindisfarne. Owen, DR. JOHN [b. 1616, d. 1683], Puritan divine, honoured both for his personal piety and his high literary attainments. His father was unable to supply him with the means for his maintenance at the University, but a rich uncle did so, and at the early age of twelve John Owen was admitted to Queen's College, Oxford, and at nineteen was Master of Arts. Two years later he was forced to leave his college for resisting the discipline of Archbishop Laud. He was at this time exercised much in his mind by doubts about his spiritual life, and this perplexity continued for nearly five years, causing a deep melancholy. Through hearing accidentally a very simple yet powerful sermon, preached by a stranger (whose name he never found out) on the text, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" he found such peace that he had from that time a serenity which never forsook him throughout his life.
He became, first, chaplain to a private gentleman; then was offered the living of Fordham, in Essex, which he occupied on the principles of Independency; but after two years the people of Coggleshall, five miles from Fordham, besought him to go to them, which he did. His fame soon spread, and he was ordered to preach before the Parliament on April 29th, 1646. His sermon was a powerful appeal for liberty of conscience. Out of gratitude to the Earl of Warwick, who had given him the living of Coggleshall, he dedicated his book, Death of Death, in the Death of Christ, to him in 1643; and it was about this time that he attracted the notice of Cromwell, who heard him preach, and desired his friendship. General Fairfax was besieging Colchester, and he, too, was struck by his eloquent preaching. Cromwell, later on, insisted upon his accompanying him to Ireland, and afterwards to Scotland, where he also remained about six months, then returning to Coggleshall; but in a very short time he was appointed by the House of Commons to the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, and the following year [1652] he was chosen Vice-Chancellor of that University, which office he held for five years. When in this high position he still retained that moderation and gentle firmness which had so endeared him to his congregation and friends.
He showed no favouritism, but was tolerant, hospitable, and generous. He preached every Sunday at St. Mary's, and often at Stadham and other neighbouring places. Probably Oxford never stood higher for learning and religion than under his rule. The book he wrote about this time, Communion with God, corresponded with his daily life. At the Restoration he was deprived of the deanery, and from that time lived privately in London, publishing many books, amongst which was an Exposition of the 130th Psalm, and An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which last was most valuable in refuting the errors of the Socinians. In 1678 he published a very powerful work upon The Holy Spirit, which shows his earnest endeavour to answer and refute all erroneous doctrines. His piety and learning won the respect of all, and even the King sent for him and assured him of his favour and respect. He died peacefully at his house at Ealing, having survived all his children.

Owen, ROBERT, Socialist writer [b. at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, Wales, 1771; d. there, 1858], was the son of poor parents, and by perseverance obtained a post in a cotton manufactory at Manchester, and afterwards at Lanark, where he met with much success. Through his benevolent schemes he largely improved the social condition of the working classes at Lanark, and published his views in 1813 in A New View of Society; or Essays on the Formation of Human Character, in which he advocated a modified Communism. With the same idea he started in 1823 for America, to found a colony at New Harmony, Indiana; but his plans failed, and he came back to England. Here he encountered fresh disappointments in the failure of two co-operative societies which he had set on foot; and another attempt in Mexico met with the like result in 1828. His Communistic ideas, which he continued to advocate, had some part in stirring up the Chartists to rebellion. Owen was a freethinker, and while in America he held a discussion with Dr. Alexander Campbell on the evidences of Christianity. In later years he devoted himself to the study of Spiritualism, under the influence of his son, Robert Dale Owen. He wrote some works on Socialism, and The Revolution in the Mind and Practice of the Human Race.

Owen, ROBERT DALE. [SPIRITUALISM.]

Oxford, BISHOPRIC OF.—Founded by Henry VIII. in 1546, who endowed it out of the lands belonging to the dissolved monasteries of Abingdon and Oseney. It was dismembered from the diocese of Lincoln, and had at first the abbey church of Oseney, about half a mile from Oxford, for its cathedral, until Christ church was converted into one. This was the original church of St. Frideswide's Priory. Her history is involved in legend, but her story is told by Philip, the third Prior, by William of Malmesbury, and John of Tynemouth, and is found in Leland's Collectanea. About 727 an alderman, named Didan, is said to have ruled over the Mercian city of Oxford; his wife's name was Saffrida, and they had a daughter, Fish who embraced the monastic life, with other maidens, her father, on her death, built a conventual church in 1 of St. Mary and All Saints, and an daughter priorem thereof. St. Frides death took place 735-40, or later. priory became a house of secular can her remains were laid beneath the existing tower until their first translation under Prior Philip [Feb. 12th, 1198], Archbishop of Canterbury to the east aisle. Many casualties passed over of St. Frideswide's ancient church at last translation. It was wholly burnt in 1002, when the Danes took in it from the massacre of St. Erim and then rebuilt and made a chapel the Monastery of Abingdon. A church must then have taken the place Saxon one, and probably the old chapter-house may have belonged to. About 1111 the priory was granted Guimond, who re-established the priory as a convent of regular canons of the Augustinian Order, in which state it remained till Wolsey's reconstruction. Commenced in 1141, and his successor, Robert de Lade, began the present structure church about the middle of the twelfth century, and in 1180 the buildings were enough advanced for the translation of Frideswide from her sepulchre to her Wolsey chose this place as the site of a new college he designed to found, already done much of the building, the works were stopped by his fall. In 1532 Henry refounded the college, which he gave his own name, but he suppressed it once more, and refounded the whole foundation. He then raised the new See of Oxford (erected at Oseney to St. Frideswide's, and this last was styled the Cathedral Church of Oxford, and comprised a dean and with other capitular officers, as well as a body of students proper to a college. The See was endowed with the revenues of lands purchased by Wolsey for his college. The bounds of the diocese extend over the whole county of Oxford, Buckinghamshire and Berkshire, with parts of adjacent counties, and it contains 648 parishes. The annual value of the Bishopric is £5,000 a year.

UNIVERSITY OF.—Though this cannot claim the honor of having led by King Alfred, yet it is from very early times it was the sort of students, who lived in usages, having only meeting houses heard lectures from learned men; as 1512 regulations were made for the maintenance of such students. As their numbers increased, the number of halls multiplied; at one time there were more than a hundred. Now only six of them exist, which are the colleges only in that they are situated, and have little or no endowment. The collegiate system took its rise in the middle of the twelfth century, at the same time that it originated in the University of Paris. In 1229 there was a great influx from Paris into Oxford, and the University was remoulded on the model of the University of Paris to rank above it in intellectual power. It was at this period, when the University was beginning to lose its importance as a great town only second to London—a place of councils and resort of the nobility, that it began to be the centre of the whole of England, and also of teaching. The earliest charter of the University as a single organization is from Henry III., but the actual foundation is from 1623. Residence in private halls fell into disuse, and by the time of Elizabeth it was compulsory that every student should reside in some college, at least during the first twelve years of study. Since 1868 students have been required to become members of the University by being members of any college or hall.

University has many times been the scene of religious changes in England. In the thirteenth century Oxford that the Wycliffite movement. Here the martyrs under Mary II. Methodism arose in Oxford, and in the nineteenth century the Tractarian movement spread from this town. There are at present one hundred colleges in the University of Oxford.

THE COLLEGES.

Balliol College.—Founded by William I. in the early part of the thirteenth century.

Christ Church.—Founded by Walter de Stapleton, Lord Chancellor and Bishop of Exeter, in 1264.

Lincoln College.—Founded by Sir John Balliol, King of Scotland, in 1268.

Merton College.—Founded in 1314 by Walter de Stapleton, Bishop of Exeter and Lord High Treasurer.

Queen's College.—Founded in 1341 by Robert de Eglesfield, Chaplain to Queen Philippa.

New College.—Founded, and for the most part built, by William of Wykeham, the first stone having been laid in 1380.

Lincoln College.—Founded in 1427 by Richard Flemmyng, Bishop of Lincoln.

Magdalen College.—Founded by William of Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester.

Brasenose College.—Founded by Bishop Smith, of Lincoln, and Sir Richard Sutton, of Prestbury, in 1512.

Corpus Christi College.—Founded in 1516 by Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester.

Christ's Church.—Founded by Cardinal Wolsey in 1525, and intended to be called Cardinal's College. The foundation was suspended by King Henry VIII., re-established in 1532, and received its present name in 1546.

Trinity College.—Originally founded by the Priors of Durham at the end of the thirteenth century. Sir Thomas Pope founded a new college on the ruins of the old one in 1554.

St. John's College.—Grafted in 1555 on the previous foundation of Archbishop Chichele by Sir Thomas White, Lord Mayor of London.

Jesus College.—Founded in 1571 by Dr. Thomas Price, Treasurer of St. David's.

Wadham College.—Founded in 1613 by Nicholas Wadham on the site of a monastery of Augustinian Friars. The work was completed by his widow, Dorothy.

Pembroke College.—Founded in 1624 by Thomas Tesdale.

Worcester College.—Founded in 1714 by Sir Thomas Cookes, on the site of Gloucester Hall, a Benedictine establishment dating from 1283.

Hertford College.—First founded at Hart Hall at the end of the thirteenth century, and was transformed into Hertford College in 1746 by Dr. Newton of Christ Church.

Keble College was erected in 1868–70 in memory of the Rev. John Keble.

THE HALLS.

New Inn Hall was built under the name of Trilbek's Inns by William of Wykeham at the end of the fourteenth century, and gained the name of New Inn in 1460. The present building was restored by Dr. Cramer.

St. Edmund Hall passed into the possession of Queen's College in 1557, in which it will finally be merged.

St. Mary Hall, formerly the parsonage, house of St. Mary's Church, was given, in 1325, by Edward II. to Oriel College, and was established as a separate place of education in 1833. It is now to be completely united to Oriol College.

Charley's Hall and Turrell's Hall.—Private halls founded according to the statute of 1882.

Oxlee, JOHN [b. 1779, d. 1854], Rector of Scrawton, in Yorkshire, and of Moleworth, wrote several books, of which the chief was The Christian Doctrine of the Trinity and Incarnation. He is said to have learnt 120 languages without a teacher. He was an original and bold speculator, and ran counter to the ordinary beliefs of the Church in many ways. Thus he published some letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury, ridiculing the doctrine of the personality of the devil. The Jewish Messenger pronounced him, next to Buxtorf, the most learned Gentile in Rabbinical lore. He wrote against the conversion of the Jews, on the ground that many assertions of Christian divines were demonstrably groundless, and that nothing could be done with any success until Christians better understood the Jewish principles. On the other hand, he maintained that the Jewish declamations against Christianity were the result of prejudice, which would disappear with mutual understanding. The late Thomas Scott, of Ramsgate, who published a vast number of tracts in favour of freethinking, included among them a long extract from Oxlee's letters to the Archbishop, and appended a biography of him.

Ozanam, ANTOINE FÉLIX [b. 1813, d. 1853].—A Frenchman who endeavoured to write a work which should equal Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. It was to be a history of Christian civilisation, written so as to vindicate Roman Catholicism. He, however, only partially succeeded, writing Dante and the Catholic Philosophy of the Fifteenth Century, History of the Civilization of the Fifth Century, etc.

Pachomius, Sr., a famous monk, and the first who prescribed a fixed rule in writing for monks, was born about 292 in Upper Thebais. He was brought up as an idolater, but in his twentieth year left the army into which he had been pressed, and became a catechumen at Thebes. After he had received baptism he joined Palemon, one of the strictest followers of St. Anthony. After they had lived together several years Pachomius had occasion to go to an uninhabited place called Tabenna, on the banks of the Nile. There he is said to have been told by an angel that he should build a monastery, and others add that the angel gave him in writing the rule which he afterwards used. Thus about the year 326 the two hermits established themselves in a small cell which afterwards became the first. Palemon died soon after, but his cell was filled by Pachomius's eldest brother, and after his death many others, so that in a short time they amounted to a hundred. The rule by which they were to live was proportioned to their strength. Their habit was of one piece, without sleeves and a hood of the same. Novices were tried with great severity before they were admitted, but when they entered they were not allowed to leave the community. None of the monks were to take holy orders, the masses were served by neighbouring priests. Pachomius himself practised the greatest austerities; he is said not to have lain down for sleep, and after his conversion never to have had a proper meal. Besides the care of his monastery, he did as much manual labour as any of the other monks. He built many monasteries in Thebais, and Palestine, and wrote an account of the Egyptian monks in 420, states that the monastery of Tabenna contained no less than a hundred monks. Pachomius's successor, Pious, resolved to spend the rest of his life in solitude, a monastery was built for him on the other side of the Nile, which he gave a rule. Many miracles were related of him, as speaking the Greek, which he had never learnt, healing the sick, etc. He died in 348, and is commemorated in the Greek Church on the fifteenth of May. In the Latin on the fourteenth, of May. It is said to have remained in the East until the eleventh century.

Pacian, St.—A Spaniard, who converted to Christianity, was born at Barcelona. He lived in the fourth century and died about 390. He was contemporary with St. Jerome, who says he was his exemplary life, his eloquence, and his writings. There are extant of his an Exhortation to Repentance, letters against the Novatians, and a treatise on Baptism.

Pacification, Edicts of.—The first was given to those decrees granted at times by the French kings during the sixteenth century for the protection of the Protestants. They were none of them of long duration, and the kings' need of the money of both parties caused them to give concessions to the Protestants, and repeal them immediately afterwards to satisfy the Catholics. The first Edict of Pacification was granted by Charles IX in 1563 at Amboise. Another was granted at Blois in 1578, but it only lasted a few months on account of an insurrection of the Huguenots. In 1570, however, he made peace again, and this time, with other concessions, granted them the towns of Rochelle urban as places of refuge in 1576 Henry III. gave liberty to build churches and services, but the Guises so fiercely that the King rescinded the edict at Blois the same year. In 1577 he refused to grant the Protestants what they had formed a league they had formed against the Catholic religion in 1598, Henry IV. signed the edict of Nantes, granting the Protestants freedom of worship, and this edict was confirmed in 1685, when it was re-

[from the Greek pais, "baptism"]. A name which held the efficacy of the baptism to infants, and actively of differences on the name applied to the ancient world. The name pagus, "a village," and tells us that the name was common of the villages or contrasted with that of the cities of population. In the world in its intelligent Christianity, the outlying village attached to the ancient villager, a "rustic," beneath "idol-worshipper." process the word heathen, who dwelt on the heath and became identified with the gods.

When Christianity began to spread in Palestine, the Roman Empire took into itself all the civilisation of India and China, and as evidence of the extension of Christianity to China, and little as to the unity of India, we may for some the Roman Empire a battle-field of idolatry set us, therefore, sketch what was the quasi-civilised world, or of which we know any when the strife began.

The Roman policy was very form of religion established among the conquered peoples, provided their sway, provided inconsistent with those of the conquerors and the necessary for the maintenance of the former. Hence civilising their religion in without any restraint, so long as it was not made the pretext for rebellion to Roman authority. And so also in other portions of the Empire, the local idolatries were rarely interfered with; the Druidism of unconquered Britain, for example, continuing to prevail when the land was subdued by the Roman legions, and other local forms of polytheism in other countries being persecuted only when socially or politically troublesome. But with the more intellectual and educated subjects of the Empire, and wherever the influence of Rome itself was much felt, external idolatry had become little more than the recognised public religion of the State, conformity to which was kept up merely on the ground of order and social propriety; the more real and ruling principles of life being found in certain systems of philosophy which had grown up among the Greeks, and had extended their influence over all the higher classes among the Romans. Thus the religion of the civilised world at the time when it stood opposed to Christianity was, partly a system of mere idolatry, the worship of things that were not God; and partly this combined with philosophical principles which were more attractive than mere idolatry could be to educated minds. These philosophical principles were developed out of three systems, which had their origin among the Greeks, who were highly civilised and acute thinkers, at a period when the Romans themselves were in their infancy.

The three systems were the Stoic, the Epicurean, and the Platonist. They will be found under their separate heads. We have here only to inquire how idolatry affected the morals of mankind. A man must be violently prejudiced, if not wilfully blind, who should refuse to see in the teachings of Plato and Socrates a desire after truth and also after virtue which was almost Divine. The whole ethical doctrine of Greek polytheism was beautiful in conception. It inculcated the recognition of mutual rights, and the rendering to each man his due, "honour to whom honour, custom to whom custom, tribute to whom tribute." Diké, "justice," was to the Greek a real god. Liberty defending itself against tyranny was courage, courage was the essence of manliness [andreia]. Individual right involved social right, the authority of law reposed on the consent of the community, and thus there was interdependence and mutual help. Law was not, as in the great Oriental tyrannies, the power exerted by the strong over the weak, but the free and spontaneous consent of a race of freemen. And to preserve this mutual welfare, consideration, kindness and forgiveness became duties. "When thy neighbour acknowledges his fault," says Hesiod, "restore him to thy friendship."

towards himself and towards God. "Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" was a question which Christianity taught as a new revelation. A Greek was ruled in his dealings with the common-wealth, but was free to do what he liked as an individual. What was the result? The result was exactly what St. Paul described it in the first chapter of the Romans: licentiousness knew no bounds, for religion had not attempted to check it. Greek indecency, wantonness, dishonesty, lying, became proverbial. "If there is one fact of history more certain than another," says a powerful writer of our own day, "it is this fact, that human nature was reduced to such a state of fetid decay by the rejection of God, that a few more years would have seen the world one gigantic dunghill of corruption and death. Then the great sacrifice took place: God, manifest in the flesh, died upon the cross, an eternal sacrifice to take away sin. A fresh invigorating breeze swept through the putrifying mass of human life. Men faced for the first time the realities of existence with an unflinching faith—by pureness, by knowledge—in a Divine life." [Mr. J. H. Shorthouse.]

When Christianity became the recognised religion of the civilised world, idolatry became a popular belief in contravention of State authority. It had at first tolerated Christianity as it did any other religion. The persecutions that we have in the New Testament are mostly raised by Jews. The rest are excited by men who found that it interfered with their personal gains [Acts xvi. 19; xix. 27]. It was only when Christianity revealed itself as an aggressive system, bound to extirpate the "gods many and lords many" from the world, and hand it over to the one lordship of Christ, that Idolatry took alarm and began to persecute fiercely. It was beaten in the struggle and Christianity triumphed. For a while an analogous state of things was repeated. Paganism was tolerated by Constantine, as Christianity had been by most of the Emperors. The heathen priests were maintained in the enjoyment of their ancient privileges, and he and his immediate successors retained the heathen title which their predecessors had held of Pontifex Maximus ["chief sacrificer."] But popular opinion was against the heathen rites, and the temples were in some cases pulled down and in others allowed to crumble into ruins. Gibbon tells with glee, though at the expense of his hero Julian, how that Emperor, in his zeal to restore Paganism, proclaimed a sacrifice to the gods in populous Antioch. Instead of hecatombs of fat oxen, such as former days had witnessed, one pale and solitary priest appeared bringing a single goose.

At an epoch when toleration was a virtue so little understood, it is no wonder that legislation was often confused, and to our minds indefensible. Governments were called upon to inculcate the faith, and to secure liberty though to some extent obliged, as a matter of fact, to respect the prejudices of the masses. When Arianism divided the Christian Church into fiercely contending bodies, Paganism lifted its head once more, but in vain, it had lost its hold upon the intellect. Theodosius the Great enacted that those who relapsed into Paganism should forfeit all rights. For years even this was evaded in the West. It was Justinian who completed the work. In his days the last temple was taken into the celebrated monastery of St. Basil.

But meanwhile Paganism had left its mark on Christianity. The Church had felt obliged to make concessions to the pagans, to meet their opposition and facilitate their conversion. Hence minor observances of paganism adopted as part of Christian ritual. The commemoration of saints is admitted by Jerome and Augustine to be derived from Pagan custom, and they justify the practice as one which the universal conscience of man approves. Neander traces the worship of the Virgin to that of Ceres. The casting of lots upon the dead which we retain in our Burial Service is derived from Paganism. The offering of votive offerings in Roman Catholic churches is like what was practised in the time of Horace. New Year's gifts and rejoicing, the use of bride-cake, the popular observance of Valentine's Day, are all of Pagan origin. And every day of our lives we have the names of the gods of our fathers on our lips, for them we call the days of the week.

Paget, FRANCIS EDWARD, d. at 1 near Lichfield, August 4th, 1882, of parish he had been incumbent for forty-years. He graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, 1828. He was one of the most prominent controversialists of his time on the side of the Oxford 'Tracts, though his writings were dry or formal treatises on theology. His sermons were mostly tales, written with great humour and the satire which they contained had great effect upon the average public opinion. In his story St. Antholin's, or Old Church New [1842], he poured merciless ridicule upon "the cheap and nasty" style in church architecture, and upon "Brummagem" Gothic. "The Compo," the professor of this style in the story, became a nickname for cheap architecture, and the style became obsolete under his fun. So in Milford Malvoisin he hurled his arrows against pews in churches, and did very much to further the "free and easy" system. In the Warden of Berkingham he became the champion of the poor against oppression of hard landlords, attacked the cruelties in the workhouse system, and revived the Bible Society. Luke St. Knowledge without Religion, was a satire against non-religious education, and The was a satire against sensation novels.

The Owllet of Owlstone Edge, satires upon the weaknesses of the human mind. There were several volumes of sermons. Forward Bound, written when a beautiful forward-looking man, whose life was dear to him in the world, got suffered not only from the end of his life, but from his intimate friends he was a man and humorous comments on the world, in which he took the last.

PAINE, a Deistical writer, was born in Norfolk, on Jan. 29th, 1737.

Quaker who had been excommunicated for marrying a member of the Church of England. He was a stay-maker, when only thirteen, was bound as an apprentice to the printer, but he only remained a few years. In 1759 he went to Sandwich, an exciseman, also carrying on a business at Lewes. In 1772 he drew up "the case of the excise," in which he showed so much ability that he was introduced to Benjamin Franklin, who came to London in 1774 from the colonies of North America to the British Government. On his return to America, and settled at Philadelphia, in 1775, he became the editor of the Philadelphia Magazine. He was the American Philosophical Society's Clerk to the Committee of Secretaries; but was obliged to resign in 1779 two years after, having been in political secret during a conspiracy against the Deane. In 1781 Paine went with Colonel Lawrence to France, in which he was more than compensated. The French granted a subsidy of ten millions of dollars by Holland. On his return he received 1000 dollars from the Congress, and from New York State the confiscated estate of Frederic Davoe, a royalist, near New Rochelle. In 1787 he came to Europe, first to France, then to England, and in 1791 and 1792 published in England his Rights of Man, in answer to Burke's Thoughts on the French Revolution. The second part was designated as "a false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel," and he was tried before the King's Bench and pronounced guilty, but escaped to France. He was chosen a member of the Convention, but offended the Jacobins by advising that the King should not be executed, but imprisoned during the war and then banished. He was therefore expelled from the Convention in 1793 as a foreigner, and from January till November, 1794, was imprisoned in the Luxembourg. It is said that his door was once marked as a sign that he was to be executed; but it opened outwards, so, when shut, the mark was hidden and he was passed over. He remained in France till August, 1802, when he returned to America, and died on his estate June 8th, 1809. His bones were brought to England by William Cobbett in 1819; but a monument was raised over his empty grave in America in 1839.

Paine's first notable work is Common Sense, which appeared in January, 1776. Burke speaks of it as "that celebrated pamphlet which prepared the minds of the people for independence." The Crisis, a series of pamphlets, which he published from 1776 to 1783, were also intended to rouse and keep alive the public spirit. His Age of Reason, published by his friend Barlow just after his imprisonment, is a violent and ignorant attack on Christianity, which alienated from him his friends both in America and England, exciting feelings of the deepest disgust and abhorrence. It was answered in several works, the most famous being Bishop Watson's Apology for the Bible in a Series of Letters to Thomas Paine, which appeared in 1796.

His other works are Reasons for Wishing to Preserve the Life of Louis Capet, The First Principles of Government, The Decline and Fall of the English System of Finance, etc.

Painting, CHRISTIAN.—In the early days of Christianity the primary object of painting was to represent Christ, either alone or as the centre of a picture, and these representations were not left to the imagination of the artist, but were copied from certain likenesses supposed to have been taken during His life upon earth. Tradition ascribed certain paintings of Christ and the Madonna to St. Luke, and the napkin of St. Veronica was preserved, on which was supposed to be depicted the Veronica. These likenesses were copied and re-copied for centuries, and departure from the ancient tradition came to be looked upon as nothing less than heresy. Until the twelfth century there was no art in Christian painting; pictures were painted in order to keep alive the spirit of devotion in the minds of the uneducated, and this object was reached by the most conventional method, made holy to the worshippers by long usage. Figures were represented as stiff and shapeless, and the only change which came over early art was the continual increase in richness of colour. The first dawn of new life began gradually to make itself felt about the twelfth century, when artists first attempted to put animation, beauty, and grace into the forms of their creation; but the work was slow, and was more a trial of skill for their own pleasure than for the sake of art. Guido, of Sienna, and Giunta, of Pisa, are associated with the birth of true Christian art—the Romanesque school; it almost reached its completeness with Giovanni Cimabue, of Florence; and with Giotto di Bondone [b. 1276, d. 1336] the last fetters of conventionalism were cast off. From this time till the fifteenth century, art continued to flourish, fostered in two schools, the Florentine and the Siennese: the former somewhat severe, resembling the Byzantine school of the early Christians; the latter more graceful and more independent of conventional ideas. The fifteenth century saw a further development, which may be traced to the increase of religious feeling consequent on the rise of the mendicant Orders. It took the form of a nearer approach to nature in form and colour, light and shade—art became more naturalistic, while still keeping the spiritual expression of the old masters. The first of this school was a Dominican monk, Fra Angelico da Fiesole [b. 1387, d. 1455], who was followed by Masaccio, Fra Lippo Lippi, and Ghirlandajo; and it reached its highest perfection with the sixteenth century, in which Christian art was represented by many great masters, headed by Raffaele and Leonardo da Vinci and Michel Angelo. With these great masters beauty of form and feature were made equal, but not superior, to spiritual import, and the result was the painting of such pictures as later artists have never been able to equal. They have influenced all Italian painting of later times.

German art, as well as Dutch and French, was far behind the Italian; during the Middle Ages it followed the Gothic style, and it was only about the middle of the fifteenth century that Italian influence began to make itself felt. The Nuremberg and Saxon schools, headed respectively by Albrecht Dürer [b. 1471, d. 1528] and Lucas Cranach [b. 1472, d. 1533], each produced a number of good artists, but their individuality was lost in close and inferior imitation of the Italian painters. In opposition to the decline of art in Italy, and consequently in Germany, a school arose in Spain in the seventeenth century which lasted only a short time, but which produced five great painters, of whom Murillo is the

The end of us St. Paul leaving Jerusalem; it is the last appearance of him in Holy Writ. At that time Roman Governor. He had repressed the evils which his predecessors but his death was the sign for the end. In the interval between the appointment of his successor, High Priest, according to the passage is generally admitted, caused St. James to be the Apostle, despite the prejudiced untried men against him as a man who won the veneration of the people for his holiness. They appear to him as entitled to hold belief in a prophet, but to have asked of the people by assuring them to regard Him in the same light as he did—that he did not, in fact, the only door into the sheep—but St. James declaring that he would come in the clouds of the world, they gave him up, who threw him from a Temple and dispatched him to the government of Albinus Messius Florus, so intolerably Jews regarded it as a punishment of St. James. They

King Agrippa made a speech trying it, but on their refusing he retired to Rome. Vespasian while to conduct the war, was in confusion at Rome, where he was emperor, and his son Titus was at warfare, and finally destroyed the Christian Church there and then into Ebionitism [Ebionites] whose annals become obscure. Chosen as St. James's successor, because he had some relation to the doctrine of the flesh. Eusebius,

Palestine, would have had written memorials in existence, but none, that circumcised men were not until the time of Hadrian. He was a false Christ, Barcochba, who led the people to a fresh revolt, but was put down with terrible bloodshed, which alienated the Christians more than double-dyed traitors. The Jews altogether separated from the Synagogue, and those who clung to Jewish customs were regarded as separatists. The ancient city was named Ælia Capitolina, the first name being taken from that of the Emperor Ælius Hadrianus; the records indicated that it was dedicated to the Jupiter of the Roman Capitol. The Christians acquiesced, apparently, with exultation in the witness which was borne to the prophecies of Christ. As a Church Jerusalem was then at an end. The ancient name of the city was restored two centuries later. [See JERUSALEM, BISHOPRIC OF.]

Palestrina, GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA, was born at Palestrina, near Rome, in 1524. He studied under CLAUDE GOUDIMEL [q.v.], and in 1551 was appointed Master of the Chapel to Pope Julius III., to whom he dedicated his first work, consisting of four masses for four voices. At the Council of Trent the state of ecclesiastical music was discussed; the Cardinals demanded the abolition of all the secular tunes which had been introduced into the sacred music, while the singers defended them. At length it was agreed that Palestrina should write a mass according to the Cardinals' taste, and he produced three, the third being the famous Mass of Pope Marcellus, which is considered his best work. He died in Rome, Feb. 2nd, 1594. He left behind him numerous compositions, many of them unpublished. [MUSIC.]

Paley, WILLIAM, a celebrated English divine, was born at Peterborough in 1743. During his infancy his father removed to Giggleswick, to become head-master of the Grammar School, and the boy was educated there. When he left for Christ's College, Cambridge, at the age of sixteen, his father said he had by far the cleverest head he had ever met with. In 1763 he graduated as Senior Wrangler, and then taught at Greenwich Academy for three years. In 1765 he gained the prize at Cambridge for a Latin dissertation on A Comparison between the Stoic and Epicurean Philosophy with respect to the Influence of each on the Morals of a People, and in the next year he was elected a Fellow and Tutor of his college. He remained there for ten more years, then married, and retired to the livings of Musgrove and Appleby, in Westmoreland, and Dalston, in Cumberland. In 1780 he became Prebendary of Carlisle, and subsequently Archdeacon and Chancellor of the Diocese. It was during this part of his life that he wrote most of his works. In 1794, as a reward for his Evidences, the Bishop of London made him a Prebend of St. Pancras, he was promoted to the sub-deanery of Lincoln, became a D.D. of Cambridge, and Rector of Bishop-Wearmouth. He died in 1805. The first of Dr. Paley's important works was The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy [1785], in which he shows himself to be a follower of Locke, and denies the theory of moral sense. In 1790 appeared the most original of his works, Horæ Paulinæ, in which, by comparing St. Paul's Epistles with the Acts of the Apostles, he shows the authenticity of both, and furnishes a testimony on behalf of revealed religion. A third important work was A View of the Evidences of Christianity, which appeared in 1794, in writing which he borrowed from the works of Lardner and Bishop Douglas. This book was very popular at the time, and ran through many editions. His last work was Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity, which Paley gained partly from Nieuwentyt's Religious Philosopher. The Natural Theology was, perhaps, the most popular of his works.

Paley stands pre-eminent in English popular theology as the Utilitarian divine. With him expediency was the one foundation of all philosophy. The laws of honour, the sense of right and wrong in the mind both of the individual and the nation, were set aside by him in favour of the doctrine that the laws both of God and man appeal to the fear of tangible punishment and the hope of tangible reward. Moral obligation means self-interest stretching through an endless future, and the proclamation of such motives is the revelation of the will of God. And this will must be made known by some authoritative method. What shall the method be? The moral sense being discarded, there remains the proof from miracles. Whoever cannot dispense with the laws of nature has no credentials of a Divine mission to offer. Consequently Paley directs his argument to proving that the evidence for the miracles of the New Testament is sufficient for the conviction of an honest conscience. Hume had declared that a miracle is so improbable in itself that no amount of external evidence is sufficient to make it credible. Paley replied that the evidence adduced in favour of the statements of the Evangelists was overwhelming. This much must be acknowledged, that Paley's style is perfect as regards clearness and directness. But the ignoring of the moral sense was a terrible weakness in his theology, and it may perhaps be regarded as the greatest merit of the philosophy of Coleridge, that he asserted against Paley the power of the conscience, of the internal evidence, and of the direct appeal of God to the soul.

Palimpsest [from Greek, palin, "again," and psao, "I scrape out"].—A manuscript written on vellum from which previous writing has been scratched off. The custom of thus using ancient MSS. was largely increased by the Mahometan conquest of Egypt, which hindered the supply of papyrus to heathen countries, and the result, no doubt, was that many ancient writings were thus destroyed. We have only to do here with those palimpsests which contain portions of the Holy Scriptures.

The most celebrated of these is the Codex Ephræmi. [CODEX.] The palimpsest of the sixth century, a part of St. Luke's Gospel, in the Museum; another of the same date of Matthew, in Trinity College, Dublin; of the eighth century in the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society. See Cassell's Bible Cyclopædia, p. 815, for account of these and of others.

Palissy, BERNARD, a noted Huguenot, was born near Agen in the Dept. of Lot-et-Garonne about 1510. He was apprenticed to a potter, and so received education. As soon as he was old enough he began journeying through France in many in order to improve his art. About 1539, he settled at Saintes. His art diminished greatly, as there was little demand for coloured glass, and the Reformation much decreased the sale of images which Palissy had painted. He had, however, made an enamelled cup while on his travels, and he set himself up for some years to attempt to discover the process of making the enamel. He worked for sixteen years, laughed at as visionary by his neighbours, and rebuffed by his wife, as they were in the poverty; but at last he was rewarded with success. Meanwhile, about 1546, he had become a Huguenot, and through his connections a Protestant Church was founded at Saintes. Towards the close of Henry II's reign, his merits were discovered by Constable Anna, of Montmorency, who wished him with the means of building a house to burn his pottery, and on his being refused, he was thrown into prison as a heretic in 1562, obtained pardon through Catharine de Medici. Catharine also protected him, more for her own benefit than for his, during the reign of St. Bartholomew; he lived in the prison and was employed in decorating the walls and gardens. However, in 1588 he was arrested and thrown into the Bastille, where he died two years after. It was at this time that his famous answer to the King's demand that he should recant had been given. Henry had told him that if he would not recant he would be left to leave him to his fate. Palissy answered: "Sire, you have several times told me to pity you; but it is I that pity you, and I have uttered the words 'I am compelled to recant' which was not spoken like a king. These are my companions, and I, who have a portion of the kingdom of heaven, will teach you the French language, that neither the Guises nor your people, nor you, will know how to compel a potter to bow the knee to the Pope." Palissy remained in his cell till his death in 1590. He is now acknowledged to be a sound thinker, and to have been one of the greatest writers in the French language. A monument was raised to him in 1861 by a Roman Catholic committee in 1861.

Pallium.—An ecclesiastical vestment used by the Pope to archbishops and the metropolitan dignity. In the East, which may be seen in the vestment of the Archbishop of Canterbury, it is a strip of white woollen cloth, "fingers broad," thrown across the shoulders, each embroidered with a gold fringe hanging over the breast and the back. The whole is worn over the alb, to which it is fastened with gold. In its original form, it was not a sacerdotal ornament, but a mantle, forming part of the robes of State, which it was only by the emperor to wear, by special permission. This prerogative was sometimes granted as a mark of honour to philosophers and men of letters, and afterwards to distinguished ecclesiastics. The bishops of the leading churches of time the Bishops of Rome have the pall upon other bishops of the first rank who are known to have received it. Symmachus [498–514]. At the Pope's consent was necessary in cases where it was only asked in the hands of those who were not his subjects, and was dispensed with altogether. The pall was looked upon as an emblem of authority, but not as a badge of office, and was not yet restricted to the use of the Pope, much less considered necessary to the exercise of their powers. Gregory the Great, however, bestowed the pall as a mark of honour on his "vicars," who were invested by him with jurisdiction of appeal; and this precedent was followed by succeeding Popes, who required the recipients an oath of fidelity to the Roman See. These "vicars" were the archbishops of their respective provinces, and by degrees the pall came to be exclusively the badge of a metropolitan. Accordingly we find that Gregory VII. [1073–1085], writing to the Bishops of France, that an archbishop is not to exercise his functions without the pall from the Pope; and the Synod of Ravenna [A.D. 877], by which the metropolitan, within three months of his appointment, should send to the Pope for the pall, accompanied by a letter of commendation of his faith. And in the canon of Innocent III. [A.D. 1215] transcribed into the Decretals, the pall was to be considered as a mark of plenitude of Apostolic power, and the function nor the title of metropolitan could be assumed without it. The use of palls became a great source of revenue. Gregory the Great had expressly forbidden the handling of money in the transaction, but his prohibition was soon overlooked, and exorbitant sums were demanded for the palls. Canute of England, on his visit to Rome in 1027, remonstrated with John XVIII. on this point, and succeeded in obtaining from him a promise of an abatement in the case of future archbishops in England.

No archbishop might inherit the badge from his predecessor; when a prelate died, he must be buried in his pall, and his successor must apply to the Pope for another.

There is one instance of an archbishop receiving two palls. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, applied to Rome [1071] in person for the decoration, and, as a mark of extraordinary favour, was invested by Alexander II., his former pupil, with two palls.

Palladius, one of the early Christian Fathers, was born about 368, in Galatia. Little is known of his early life till in his twentieth year he went to Egypt, to learn something of the monks there, and resided among them for some time, and thence to Palestine, where he spent three years in Mount Olivet, and became acquainted with Rufinus, of whom he was a great admirer. In 400 he was made Bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia; but on account of his attachment to St. Chrysostom he became implicated with the Origenists, and was violently hostile to St. Jerome. He is supposed to have been banished, and on his recall to have been made Bishop of Aspona, in Galatia, where he died about 431.

Palladius was the author of a Greek work containing the lives of several Palestinian and Egyptian monks. It is entitled The Lausaic History, from Lausus, Governor of Cappadocia, to whom it is dedicated. Another work, A Dialogue of the Life of St. Chrysostom, written in 408, is attributed to him, but its authenticity is doubtful.

Pallavicini, SPORZA, Jesuit and Cardinal, son of the Marquis Alexander Pallavicini, was born at Rome in 1607. He was educated for the bar, and became a learned philosopher and lawyer, but entered the Order of the Jesuits in 1637. He became Professor of Philosophy in the Jesuit College in 1639, of Theology in 1643, was made Cardinal by Pope Alexander VII. in 1659, and died in 1667.

Pallavicini's chief fame is derived from his History of the Council of Trent. In 1619, Paolo Sarpi had written an account of the Council, the principles of his book being distinctly in favour of the Reformed opinions, and it was thought necessary to repel its attacks on Romanism. Torenzio Alciati was chosen for the task, but died in 1651, before he had gathered together all the material, and the work was carried out by Pallavicini. The book appeared in two volumes [1656, 1657], and was highly extolled by the Roman Catholics.

Palm Cross.—A stone cross or crucifix mounted on steps, sometimes seen near the entrance of a church [usually on the south]. The name has reference to the custom of decorating it with branches of palm for the procession on Palm Sunday. There are several ancient palm crosses in Cornwall; and Eyam Church, in Derbyshire, has one which is remarkable for the beauty of its sculpture.

Palm Sunday.—The day on which is commemorated our Lord's triumphant entry into Jerusalem, five days before His Passion. Throughout a great part of Christendom it is marked by a procession of palms. Some authors affirm that this ceremony is as old as the fourth century, and claim St. Cyril of Jerusalem as alluding to it. It is certain, however, that the ceremony was practised in the fifth century. The services of the Church of England for this day are marked by special second lessons, recording the great event of the day. St. Paul, in the epistle for the day, calls on us to honour the humiliations of Jesus Christ, which were the result of a profound obedience to His Father and an ardent affection for the souls of men; and, by insisting on the glory to which He was raised, the same Apostle exhorts us to practise those virtues.

Palmer [Lat. palmifer, "a palm-bearer"].—A name given to that class of pilgrims who had performed the pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, and returned home carrying branches of Oriental palm, in token of their accomplished expedition. On arriving home they offered the palm to the priest to be placed on the altar, and these were frequently used in processions on Palm Sunday. Even after their return they continued their religious pilgrimages in their own country, and thus the word "palmer" was sometimes used for itinerant monks without a fixed residence, professing voluntary poverty, and visiting at times the most remarkable sanctuaries. The dress of the palmers was the same as that of the ordinary pilgrims, namely, a black or grey gabardine, girt with a cincture, from which a shell or scap was suspended, a broad hat ornamented with scallop shells, and a long staff.

Palmer, Edward Henry, an English Orientalist, was born at Cambridge in 1840. He studied at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1867, and for the next three years made expeditions in Sinai, and became perfectly acquainted with the language and manners of the Bedouins. In 1871 he was made Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and remained in England till the beginning of the Sudan war. He then went out to Egypt to try and dissuade the Bedouins from their attacks on the Suez Canal, but was captured, with two European companions, Captain Gill and Lieutenant Charrington, in the Desert of El Tih, and murdered 11th, 1882.

His books have proved very an Orientalists. They are The Holy Land and the Desert of Scripture; The Desert of the Exodus; History of Nations from the Earliest Times; etc.

Palmer, HENRY (b. at Wimbornton, March 29th, 1601; d. Aug. 12th, 1668), his degree at Cambridge, became Queen's College; ordained in 1622 at St. Albans, Canterbury, in 1625 city preacher at Cambridge in 1627 of Ashwell, to which he was promoted Archbishop Laud. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly in 1646; in 1646 he had been appointed Master of the new church at Westminster in 1644 been appointed Master of the College, Cambridge. Palmer was a learned and scholarly preacher, but is chiefly known by his method of catechising and his catechisms which he prepared. His Exposition to make the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, Sacraments, Fasts and Fairs. He was Chairman on the Committee of the Council and his own catechism above-mentioned taken as the basis of the Westminster Catechism. He wrote also Vindiciae in defence of Sabbath observance, and of Godliness and Christianity, and Christian paradoxes, sometimes as Lord Bacon.

Palmer, WILLIAM (b. 1811), a writer, brother of Lord Selborne, was of an Oxfordshire rector. When young he was elected to a demyship at Balliol College, where, in 1830, he took his degree as a First Class in Literæ Græcæ. He had already gained the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse, and subsequently that for a Latin essay on the subject of the Athenian comedy. He was expelled from his college, and acted as teacher in classical schools. He was one of those who followed Dr. Newman in seceding to being dissatisfied with the Protestantism of the English Church, and he time resided chiefly in Italy, living of a student, but never taking part in the Roman Church. He died April 5th, 1879.

He wrote many works, as The Anglican Doctrine with that of the East; A Letter to a Protestant; An Introduction to Early Christian Egyptian Chronology, The Parable of the Tares, etc. Origines Liturgicæ, by Sir William Palmer, of Worcester has often been attributed to him and Magdalen.

REV. SIR WILLIAM [d. at the the present century, d. 1835], supporter of the Oxford movement at Dublin in 1824, incorporated at Magdalen Hall in 1828, Worcester in 1831, Vicar of Ald from 1846-59, and Prebendary from 1849-58. He was, in 1846, Vicar of Whitechurch with Chidcock, Marshwood, & Gabriel. He was the author of Tracts; The Apostolical Jurisdiction of the Episcopacy in the 16th Century; A Treatise on the 16th Century; A Compendious Ecclesiastical History. Not long before his death he wrote a very interesting narrative of the Tracts for the Times.

St. P., was a native of Berytus, and descended from one of the noble families in the province. He studied in his own country, and in Alexandria, under Pierius, a great learning that he was called P. From Alexandria, P. came to Caesarea, in Palestine, where he was a priest, and where his learning made him the greatest ornament of the church. His favourite employment was Holy Scripture, and to promote the improvement of ecclesiastical learning, he founded a library at Caesarea, which contained a great number of useful works. Amongst whom St. Pamphilus most attention was Origen, the whole of which he copied with his own hand, and he had them afterwards, very highly. It is said that he used most of the material for the History of the Church from the Caesarean library. Pamphilus also founded a school of divinity at Caesarea, which was continued until 307, during the Maximian persecution. Pamphilus was seized by Urbanus, a priest, and, after being tortured into prison, where he remained for three years, during which he wrote Origens, in five books, to which he added a sixth, but the first alone is preserved. Pamphilus and his companions died on Feb. 18th, 309, but the others are commemorated by Eusebius afterwards took the name of Pamphilus, and wrote an account of him, which is now lost.

Pan-Anglican Synod. [Lambeth Conference.]

Pantenus, Sr., was born at Sicily in the second century. He applied himself successfully to the study of philosophy, and belonged to the Stoics till he was converted to Christianity. He was the first catechetical teacher at Alexandria, to which post he was presented during the reign of Marcus Aurelius. The Ethiopians having sent to the Bishop for a divine to instruct them, Pantenus was sent by Demetrius (cir 190), and is said to have discovered a Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew which had been left there by the Apostle St. Bartholomew. Nothing is known of Pantenus after 202. St. Jerome says that he wrote several commentaries on the Scriptures, but that his lectures were more serviceable to the Church than his writings, which are now lost.

Pantheon, at Rome, once a heathen temple dedicated to Jupiter and all the gods. In 608 re-dedicated by Pope Boniface IV. to the Virgin Mary and all the saints. It is also called the Rotunda, from its fine dome, which is very celebrated, and suggested the idea of the domes of modern times.

Pantheism [from pan, "everything," and Theos, "God"].—The belief that God is everything, and everything God. In one form Pantheism may be regarded as a protest against Materialism. Those who regarded the visible world as the sum total of all things, became from the very nature of the case Atheists. Those who recognised that thoughts and feelings are things just as real as things that can be touched, were so far emancipated from the blank hopelessness of the Materialist creed. Pantheism may be regarded as an importation from the Eastern philosophies, the groundwork of which was the belief in an Infinite Eternal Being which clothes itself in a multiplicity of forms, and thus makes up the universe. But the great origin of modern Pantheism must be traced to Germany. The endeavour to construct a basis of belief which should supersede the old traditional supremacy over the conscience claimed by the Church of Rome led to the theories of Spinoza, of Schelling, of Hegel, and upon these theories much of the succeeding Pantheism of modern thought has been founded. The first postulate of the system is, not an objective faith which rules and regenerates the life of man, but religious ideas and thoughts which have to find their assimilation in the facts of the universe, and to make these fit in with arbitrary assumption. The sense of harmony, the æsthetic faculty, requires a religion, and therefore a religion which meets this want must be true. Of course, where free license is thus given to the imagination, it is no wonder that Pantheism takes a thousand forms. "Matter," says one, does not exist except as an idea of our minds." "Matter," says another, "is the body of God, and the unseen life, energy, intelligence of the universe are His soul. The two co-exist, and are inseparable." "There is no God beside Me," says the Creator by His prophet Isaiah; but the Pantheist applies this to the Universe, and represents it as saying, "I am God, and there is no other." It is true that the higher expression of Pantheism admits such ideas as God, Revelation, Creation, Providence, as something more than subjective, as expressing realities beyond the mind. But unfortunately when it is sought to fix and define these realities, they vanish like shadows. Thus a very able Unitarian minister, speaking of Gibbon's account of himself sitting in the Coliseum, and suddenly resolving there and then to write his famous book, regards that resolution as parallel to the inspiration of the Hebrew prophets who heard the Word of the Lord speaking to them and sending them a message. But such a comparison is not exalting to the modern writer, it simply drags down the ancient. To deny any real inspiration which comes direct from God, without any modification beyond that caused by the imperfection of the mind to comprehend it, is practically Pantheism. It denies personal intercourse between God and the soul. There may be a veiled Pantheism, too, in the view so often put forth of late, that conceptions of God have varied from age to age according to human circumstances. Thus the Jew conceived of God as a Deliverer when the Exodus from Egypt was new, and as a Legislator when order supervened upon anarchy, and as King when the nation was united, and as Father when Christ had compassion on the multitudes. There is truth, of course, in all this, as there is in the modern conception that He is an all-pervading beneficent Power; but it becomes error if it ignores the fact that God is, and ever has been, all these. The original grounds of faith in a Divine Creator, and Ruler, and King, and Saviour fail, when one aspect only is confessed. The supposed discovery becomes a mere childish game at hide and seek, where the finder and found are identical; fear and gratitude are predicated, but the source from which they spring becomes a shadow.

Unhappily Pantheistic opinion involves moral consequences of a sad character. The sinking of the personal distinction between man and God is followed by the loss of the affections and the conscience, which are the very life of religion. If God is already identified with His creatures, where is the room for obedience to Him, for His supreme law, for prayer which asks for what otherwise it would not receive? Above all, the holiness of God would disappear, as He becomes identified with the struggles and failures of the Creation. "The comparative and relative perfection of His Being," we are told, "is only to be reached by strife with it within and out, from which the spirit mourns and aunts after every conflict." It is impossible to exaggerate the moral danger of a Pantheism which does all the abominations of sin [Jer] that evil in fact is a necessity for the liberation of virtue, not a moral consequence of liberty, and that the teaching of Pantheism is erroneous when it tells us that possibilities are open to us, life and death between which man has to choose. It is the very centre of human personality without it we lose the distinction between human agency and the agency of God. It is instructive is it to watch the progress of the denial of this distinction. It is a strife going on, says the modern Pantheist, and its conditions make the world so that it is only just endurable, and the progress of civilisation makes things worse, for they increase the consciousness of misery. Such is the Pantheism of Pessimism, identified with the name of Schopenhauer. "I know no theory of the universe," says a celebrated living writer, "which leads me to think that it would not have been better for mankind if they had never been born."

Not only worship must disappear before such a creed, but morality also. Long before men reasoned about theories of life and the ultimate good, light and life were given to the world by the Ten Commandments, and the commentaries upon them in Psalms and Prophets. They were based on the principle that man is subject to a Will higher than his own and distinct from it, the Will of an eternally righteous and unchanging Lord. By this conviction men's lives have been governed and brought into a measure of order and peace. Pantheism sweeps away Lawgiver, King, and Judge. So long as God was believed in, the noblest spirits among men could face the terrible difficulties and problems of life, even with joy, because they believed Him faithful. They were like men with the sun over their heads casting light all around them. But the night cometh. Nature fails us all, and when God is denied, men do the deeds of darkness, and learn to praise the dead more than the living. The only refuge from such dreariness and despair is to believe in God even as Abraham did, even as St Paul did, who knew in whom he believed, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Papal Infallibility. [Infallibility.]

Papal Power, Growth of.—The causes which led to this plain fact of history are just those which would tend to bring about the increase of a power which professed to be spiritual and Christian. But, besides this, the advocates of the Papacy base its claim to supremacy over the whole Christian Church on Scripture, citing Matt. xvi. 18, 1 proof: "And I say also unto thee, that

 "Wherever a bishop be," says St. Jerome

 as now], "at Constantinople or at Rhegium, at Alexandria or at Thanis, he is of the same worth, and of the same priesthood . . . they are all successors of the Apostles." This is exemplified in the case of the three Churches founded by St. Peter, or believed to be so—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch. Now, although the Church of Antioch was founded by St.
 Peter, and is said to have been the seat of his episcopate before he went to Rome, still it ranked below Alexandria, which appears only to have been founded under his direction by his disciple, St. Mark; the reason being that Alexandria was the second city in the Empire, and the capital of Egypt, whilst Antioch was only the third. In a similar way the Church of Rome ranked first of all because Rome was the first city in the Empire. So too Byzantium, which had been only an ordinary bishopric, when it was made by Constantine the Great the second capital of the Empire with the new name of Constantinople, was raised by the second General Council [A.D.
 381] to the rank of a patriarchal See, and placed next to Rome itself, above the Apostolic See of Antioch. This brings us face to face with the fact that the foundation of the Papal power rested on the circumstance that the Pope was Bishop of Rome. We are now in a position to trace the growth of this power. Before doing so it may be well to refer to the Title of Pope. In the East this term has been vaguely applied to almost any ecclesiastical person. In the West its use was confined at an early period to bishops. In the sixth century it began to be more often used of the Bishop of Rome than of other bishops; in the ninth century this was still further the case; and, finally, its use in addressing any one besides the Bishop of Rome was forbidden by Gregory VII. in the Council of Rome of the year 1073.

We have seen that the foundation-stone of the Papal Supremacy was Rome itself. Rome was what no other city has ever been—the capital of the whole civilised world; it was, moreover, the centre of the civil and military government of the Empire. St. Paul himself felt the greatness of Rome and the importance of witnessing for Christ there [Acts xix. 21, xxiii. 11, xxv. 11, xxviii. 15]. Again, the Roman Church was an Apostolical one, the only Western Church which could claim this title at all. St. Paul had lived there long, had written his greatest epistle to it, and had received the crown of martyrdom there. St.
 Peter, too, may have resided in Rome; very early tradition says that he had been its bishop, and he had probably been martyred there. To Apostolical Churches belonged a certain degree of reverence, and the Church of Rome could boast of the two great Apostles.

Besides this, in early days, the Roman Church was always orthodox. It was not a Church of great literary fame, but it held fast "the faith once delivered to the saints." When heretics came to Rome to further their views, their opinions were rejected by the stern orthodoxy of the Roman Church, and the news of this, spreading over the Christian world, tended to increase the influence of the Bishops of Rome. On such grounds, Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons [180], says that "with this Church the whole Church [i.e. the faithful everywhere] must agree—with this Church . . . in which the Apostolical tradition has always been preserved." And in like manner Tertullian, "What a happy Church is that on which the Apostles poured out all their doctrine with their blood. . . . Let us see what she hath learned, what taught." The references of the ancient Fathers to the Roman Church are full of respect and of a desire to set Rome as high as possible; but they speak of it as belonging to the same class with other Apostolic Churches, and rest its glory on its connection with both the Apostles, SS. Peter and Paul, on their having founded it, settled it, and taught it, and not on any promise of our Lord to St. Peter and his successors. Rather later, Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage [248], a man of great abilities and lofty character, was brought into close relations with the Church of Rome. We find that he writes to, and treats, its Bishops on terms of perfect equality. He addresses them as "brother and colleague;" and whilst he holds up the general dignity of the episcopate, he never owns, or even shows, that he was aware of any right in the Bishop of Rome to rule over the whole Church. Even those passages in his writings which speak in an exalted way of St. Peter, and of the Roman Church as founded by him, appear rather to be symbolical, representing St. Peter as the type of Apostleship and the Roman Church as the type of unity, than to imply that he admitted in any way the supremacy of the Roman See as it was afterwards understood.

In the reign of the Emperor Constantine [306] the Bishops of Rome became more important still. Christianity was made the acknowledged religion of the Empire, hence the number of Christians and of the clergy was largely increased; and, besides this, the bishops and clergy were allowed to receive legacies, and thus grew in wealth. It is also probably true that Constantine gave to Bishop Sylvester and his successors his own palace, the Lateran Palace, as the episcopal residence [see "Donation of Constantine" further on]. In his reign, too, was founded the New Rome, Constantinople, and from this time onwards the Old Rome knew

From early times the ecclesiastical ^{more} followed the lines of the civil ^{more} Empire, and thus the bishop ^{more} of the city or metropolis of each province—title of metropolitan—had presided ^{more} at of the bishops and clergy of the province had been looked upon, in Church ^{more} as the representative of the province. Constantine made a new partition of the Empire into dioceses, each of which ^{more} several provinces. In the West the ^{more} the chief city of a diocese received the primate, and was at the head of all the ^{more} politans within his limits, but without cising their privileges. The most ^{more} of these primates were called patriarchs Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Jerusalem]. The patriarchate ^{more} included the seven provinces of Misraim Lower Italy, with Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily; but in none of these had ^{more} tans yet been introduced, so that the ^{more} of Rome exercised metropolitan functions for the consecration of bishops, the convocation of synods, the ultimate decision of ^{more} many other sorts of authority—the ^{more} the whole patriarchate. This in ^{more} degree tended to exalt the importance of the Roman See. The State acknowledged Christianity also gave the bishops political influence, since their opinions were sought after not only by bishops, but by Emperors who wished their support in the religious controversies of the time.

The next great step in the building up of the Papal power dates from the Council of Sardica [343], held at a town of that name in Illyria, and summoned as a General Council of the Church by the Emperors of East and West. Its object was to heal divisions in the Church caused by the rise of heresy [ARIUS]; but as the Western Church separated themselves elsewhere, so that the Council of Sardica was no longer a title to the name "General." Some of the Canons enacted gave a bishop the privilege of appealing to the Bishop of Rome as a referee, not to decide himself, but to say whether there ought to be a new trial, in this case allowing him to send Legates [LEGATES] to sit with the judges. These canons have been founded the jurisdiction by the Bishop of Rome over the whole Church; and in the next century than one Bishop of Rome referred to the Canon Canons as Canons of the Council of Nicæa, which had been held nearly a hundred years earlier, and was recognised as such by the Universal Church. By such means in course of time, the appellate jurisdiction of the Pope came to be more and more formal appeals, the practice of going to Rome for advice in distant parts of the Church. who was Bishop of Rome in an application from Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, in Spain, and his letter is a fine piece in the series of what are called Epistolæ, or Letters. At these letters were written in the name of the Pope alone, and their authority rose from one of brotherly command.

These views might be furthered, and the Roman See was wanted of one who was determined on the aggrandisement of his office. INNOCENT I. [A.D. 402]. He set a principle that all Churches should follow the usages of Rome, but appealed to the claim to those of the West—

Italy, the Gauls, the Spains, and the islands which lie between them, that they had been founded by St. Peter or his successors. The daughter Churches were often imitated to a large extent, as in the case of the Anglo-Saxon Church, which owed its organisation, though of different origin, to Roman missionaries, and a firm maintainer of the Papal authority in legitimate matters. In like manner the Pelagian controversy [PELAGIUS] said that the Fathers consulted, in remote provinces, were settled unless it came to the Roman See, so that the Pope might serve as a rule for all.

The next Bishop, Zosimus, declared the authority of the Pope to be such that no one might contradict its decisions, and that the Pope should inherit from him an authority to that which our Lord bestowed upon the apostle himself.

That of Boniface I. [A.D. 418] was also of great value named Eulalius. In consequence, the former applied to the Pope for aid, and was by him assisted in his See. This intervention of the Pope on the request of the Pope himself have laid the foundation for which Emperors afterwards followed the election of the Popes, and have added to the power of the half of the fifth century was over the power of the Roman Empire was decaying, the Empire was tottering to its fall. Already fallen a prey to the Goths, Sicily had suffered severely. Here, the Church was in evil case, many heresies rife within her [PRISCILLIANISTS, PELAGIANS], whilst outside she was assailed by the Arian powers of the barbarians. It was at this juncture that Leo I., or the Great, became Pope. He stands out as the Christian representative of the Imperial dignity and severity of old Rome, and is the true founder of the mediæval Papacy in its uncompromising strength, representing strongly that one side of the developing life of the Church which is especially identified with Rome—authority and unity. St. Leo—for he is a saint of the Church—was a man lofty and severe in life and aims, a theologian, and a man of personal piety. He is the reputed inventor of the Collect form of prayer, and its “Roman brevity and majestic conciseness” are consonant with his character and the style of his writings. Notwithstanding his ambition and love of domination, we may not doubt that, in his exertions for the elevation of the Roman See, he believed himself to be labouring, not for its benefit only, but for the benefit of the whole Church. The man and the times suited one another. Leo boldly declared the pretensions and practices of the Roman Church to be matters of unbroken Apostolical tradition, and thus tried to enforce the usages of Rome on the whole Church. He represented the Sardican Canons as to appeals as Canons of the General Council of Nicæa, or perhaps adopted what was now the usual practice of Rome. The Vandals who conquered the province of Africa were Arians, and the hitherto independent African Church was now glad to submit to Leo’s interference as the price of his support. A chance dispute amongst the bishops in Gaul was taken advantage of, when one of the bishops appealed to Rome against his metropolitan—the great and good Hilary of Arles—to lay down the declaration that Rome had always been accustomed to receive appeals from Gaul, and the Emperor Valentinian III. passed a law enforcing this view.

During Leo’s pontificate arose the Eutychian controversy [EUTYCHES], which was settled at the General Council of Chalcedon A.D. 451. At this Council the Legates whom Leo sent to represent him sat as presidents of the clergy with Anatolius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and the practical adoption, though only after discussion, of Leo’s tome, or letter to Flavian [Bishop of Constantinople], treating of the doctrine of our Lord’s Incarnation, contributed greatly to raise the general opinion of the authority of the Bishop of Rome.

The claims of the Roman See were maintained during the next century and a half, but they made no great progress until the time of GREGORY I., or the Great [590], a man of great personal piety, as well as an able ruler both in temporal as well as spiritual things. As the Emperor lived at Constantinople, and governed Italy by an Exarch, or lieutenant, at Ravenna, the country was practically left with very little defence against the Lombards, and Gregory had often to provide for the safety of the people, and to negotiate peace with the enemy. This led to a large increase in the temporal power of the Popes. Again, the Popes had gradually become great landowners. The "Patrimony of St. Peter," as the estates of the Roman See came to be called, were situated, not only in Italy, but in many distant countries. Gregory managed this property by agents, often in minor orders, and through them he communicated with the Churches and the Sovereigns of these various countries, and thus the Roman See gained a footing and influence wherever it possessed estates. From the time of Gregory onwards the authority of the bishops was more and more depressed by the Popes. Persons often only in minor orders were empowered, by a commission from the Pope, to set aside the rule of the bishops, and to deprive them of their rights. Gregory, moreover, brought himself into a closer connection with the Churches and Sovereigns of other countries by appointing certain bishops as his deputies or vicars, and as a mark of this commission he sent them the pallium. [PALLIUM.]

English people will always hold Gregory in reverent esteem for sending Augustine as a missionary to Kent.

The next event of considerable importance was the opposition of Pope Gregory II. to Leo III. [717], the Isaurian. This Emperor took strong objection to the worship of images which had sprung up, and by edicts ordered their destruction in all the Churches of the Empire. [ICONOCLAST.] The Emperor was reluctantly obeyed in the East, but the Pope refused to yield, and boldly armed against the enemy; finally, the Imperial fleet was destroyed at the mouth of the Po, and a synod was summoned in which the Iconoclasts were condemned. The Pope pursued his victory no further, but by moderate counsels preserved Italy outwardly to the Empire, whilst at the same time he greatly increased his own power.

In the pontificate of Zacharias [741] we have the first instance wherein the civil duties of a nation, and the rights of a crown, were submitted to the decision of a Pope. Pepin, the Mayor of the Palace under Childeric, the last of the Merovingians, asked Pope Zacharias whether the nation of the Franks should be ruled by the real or nominal holder of power. Zacharias decided in Pepin's favour. The question was merely a point of casuistry, laid before the first religious judge of the Church; but later Popes pretended that Zacharias had exercised a right belonging to his office and had deposed Childeric.

In the year 800, Charlemagne, the son of Pepin, was crowned in St. Peter's at Rome by Pope Leo III., with the Imperial title. Rome was grateful to her deliverer from the Lombards, an Emperor was needed, was the spokesman of the people as well as a consecrating priest, and Charles the Great was crowned; by this event was founded the right, claimed afterwards by the Popes, of raising and deposing monarchs at their will.

Later than this, two great forgeries were put forth which greatly helped the Papacy. [1] The so-called "Donation of Constantine" which was believed to be true from the middle of the fifteenth century. It pretended that Constantine had conferred on Sylvester the right of wearing the crown, that he had endowed the See with the Lateran Palace (this was probably true), with the city and with all the provinces of Italy; that in consequence of this Constantine relinquished the ancient capital, built a new city for himself—Constantinople. Its pretended date was about 330. It was invented to give an ancient right to things which had become matters of course more or less. [2] "The False Decretals" of the sixth century Dionysius Exiguus, who collected the Canons from the General, and famous Provincial, Councils, and to which he added the "Decretals" letters of the Popes, so that these latter were set forth as having the same weight as the Canons. His collection was generally received as a book of law in the West, except in Spain. Isidore, Bishop of Seville [601—636], made a separate collection. About 840 and 850 Isidore started the False Decretals under the name of the great Isidore. These were skilful forgeries, and profess to be the decrees of Bishops of Rome going back to Apostolic days. Their aim is to establish the hierarchy as a whole, asserting the authority of the clergy as a body against the power of the Emperors; but they carry the power higher than it had ever been before, and since they found their weakness in the collections of the canon laws, and in the code of the Papacy, their aim was very strong, and, indeed, still exists, although the deception is admitted.

An example of the righteous use of Papal power, and one which shows the moral support of the civilised world was given to it, occurred in the Pontificate of Louis I. [858]. Lothair II., a vicious and unprincipled prince, wished to obtain a divorce from his queen and marry another woman. Nicolas firmly opposed him, even when two French Metropolitans and annulled the decisions of a Frankish National Council because they favoured the divorce. These measures were novel and aggressive, but the rightness of the cause prevented their being questioned. From the eighth century onwards the Popes had granted special privileges to monastic bodies [MONKS], by which they were exempted from all jurisdiction but that of the peace throughout Christendom. Thus he compelled the observance of peace between the Kings of Castile and Portugal by the threat of excommunication and interdict.

[EXCOMMUNICATION; INTERDICT.] He enjoined the King of Arragon to restore his debased coin. By a general interdict enforced throughout France he compelled Philip Augustus—a powerful prince—to take back his wife whom he had repudiated; and England was not the only country which he converted into a spiritual fief. On the whole, Innocent was the greatest and most successful of the Popes. The times themselves were favourable to his ability and gifts, as well as to his pretensions. A strong, uncompromising power, exercised upon the whole on the side of God and of right, was needed, and Innocent exactly met the want.

The Popes were at the summit of their power during the thirteenth century. “Rome inspired during this age all the terror of her ancient name. She was once more the mistress of the world, and kings were her vassals.” The Emperor Frederick II. had taken the sign of the Cross, by which he bound himself to serve in the Holy War of Palestine; but he considered himself at liberty to fulfil his vow at his own time, and on this account became embroiled with successive Popes. Innocent IV., at a Council at Lyons, 1245, declared him to be deposed, and this, and the proscription of Alexander IV., were the main causes of the ruin of his family.
This is the most successful instance of the exercise of the power of deposing kings which history affords.

In 1294 Boniface VIII. became Pope, and endeavoured to carry out Hildebrand's idea of the Papacy, but the real power of the Roman See was beginning to wane. The first successes of the Crusades were being followed by failure and disasters; the Holy Land was being abandoned, and the preaching of a Holy War ceased to rouse men to enthusiasm.
The high pretensions of the Canon Law were opposed by the revived study of the Roman civil law, which contained a lofty theory of imperial and secular power. Boniface quarrelled with Philip of France, who would not yield to him, and death only prevented the Pope from publishing a Bull of deposition against the King. Just after his death the Popes settled at Avignon, and came under the control of the sovereigns of France.
[PAPAL SCHISM.] Next followed the Councils of Constance and Basel, and afterwards the movement of the Reformation, all tending to limit and cripple the Papal power.

No student of history can fail to see what an important part the Papacy played in the Middle Ages, nor can he fail to admit that, though deformed by many human imperfec-tions, it was yet powerful for good, by opposing to the idea of mere brute force that of an unseen but mightier spiritual power, which, in a comparatively lawless age, did on the whole defend the innocent and weak and punish the guilty and strong.

But whilst freely admitting this, he can find no foundation either in Holy Scripture or in the page of history for the assertions of a celebrated Bull of Boniface VIII. ["Unam Sanctam"], one sentence from which appears to sum up the Papal claims: "Moreover we declare, affirm, define, and pronounce that it is altogether necessary for salvation that every human creature should be subject to the Roman Pontiff."

Papal Schism.—During the seventy years [see preceding article] in which the Popes resided in Avignon they became more or less the servants of the French sovereigns. Gregory XI. became Pope in 1370, and his pontificate was a series of disasters. Italy, deserted by the Popes, was in a deplorable condition: the ecclesiastical estates were oppressed by their governors; they revolted, and leagued themselves with the Florentines and Viscontis to throw off the Papal rule. Gregory therefore determined, urged thereto by the solicitations of St. CATHARINE OF SIENNA [q.v.], to return to Rome and reside there, and he was received joyfully on Jan. 17th, 1377; but he found it no easy matter to rule over his neglected subjects, and was meditating a return to Avignon when his death—March 27th, 1378—prevented it. On his death began what is known as the Great Western Schism. Italy was not satisfied with the fact of having got her Pope back to Rome; during the long residence at Avignon the Cardinals had come to be all Frenchmen, and thus were completely under the power of the King of France. So when, after the funeral of Gregory, the Conclave met in St. Peter's to elect his successor, they were assailed by a tumultuous populace, demanding with threats that they should have a Roman, or at any rate an Italian, Pontiff. After many fierce discussions between the Cardinals, they were forced to yield to the demands of the people, and they chose Bartolomeo de Prignano, Archbishop of Bari; he took the name of Urban VI., and was crowned in St. John Lateran on Easter Day, April 18th, 1378. All the Cardinals were present, and thus gave a tacit consent to the legality of his election. But it was not long before they repented of their work. Urban proved to be a man of imprudent zeal, imperious, and of a most ungovernable temper. The Cardinals retired to Anagni, whence they communicated with those left at Avignon, and declared that the election of Urban, being compulsory, was illegal, and therefore might be considered as null and void. They then proceeded to elect another Pope, and chose Robert, Cardinal of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII., and went to reside at Avignon. He was acknowledged Pope by France, Sicily, and the kingdoms of Spain. Urban refused to resign, and was acknowledged Pope by the rest of Europe. Thus there were two Popes and two sets of Cardinals, and endless divisions and dissension in the Church followed, the Pope and the Anti-Pope excommunicating and anathematising each other. It was agreed to refer the matter to a general council, but then arose the difficulty as to under whose auspices it was to sit. Urban made successful war on Naples, and Clement, who was under its protection, was obliged to fly and seek safety at Avignon. He was not, however, so successful in his war with Charles of Durazzo, who besieged him at Nocera; and, suspecting treachery from some of his Cardinals, Urban summoned them to Nocera on the plea of business, had six of the most learned and of best repute arrested and cast into a fatal prison, and then put to torture. The Pope, with the help of Raimondello Orsini, escaped from Nocera to Genoa. He died in 1389. Clement VII., his rival, reigned at Avignon in comparative peace and dignity, and on Urban's death he indulged hopes that Christendom would agree in acknowledging him as their legal Pontiff; but these were quickly dissipated, for the Italian Cardinals proceeded to elect as their new Pope, Pietro Tomacelli, a Neapolitan, who took the name of Boniface IX. His pontificate is remarkable for the growth of simony; but he was heavily pressed with debt, and the opposition Papal Court at Avignon was possessed of the Church revenues of France and Spain, which had hitherto belonged to Rome, whilst the progress of Wycliffite doctrines curtailed his income from England. He therefore published a Bull by which he secured to himself the annates, or first fruits—equal to a year's revenue—on all vacant bishoprics and abbeys. Clement meantime surrounded himself with thirty-six cardinals, to whom he made grants of benefices before they were void, giving them possession as soon as they should be vacant; this greatly irritated the French clergy, and they appealed to the King to get matters settled between the two Popes. Clement died Sept. 16th, 1394, and the University of Paris adjured the King not to elect a new Pope; but the Cardinals, without awaiting the King's orders, proceeded to elect a Spaniard, Pedro, Cardinal of Luna, under the name of Benedict XIII. He had pledged himself before election to do all in his power to heal the schism; but having got the power he would not relinquish it, and the King of France, having vainly sought to get him to resign, together with Castile, renounced obedience to him, and he was held a prisoner at Avignon, 1398. Boniface was equally obstinate in the matter of any compromise, and remained at Rome, exercising his share of dominion. Matters were thus at the close of the fourteenth century. For five years Benedict XIII. remained a prisoner, when he

by the help of Louis, King of Sicily, and more France acknowledged him as Boniface died at Rome, Sept. 29th, and was succeeded by Cosmato Migliorini assumed the title of Innocent VII. Gregory was troubled by quarrels of the Ghibellines, and on the success of Ladislaus, King of Naples, fled to Viterbo, but afterwards returned, only to die in 1406. The Roman Cardinals, before proceeding to elect his successor, took an oath that whoever might be elected Pope should at once renounce the claims of his rival at Avignon could be made likewise. They elected Angelo Corrario, Italian by birth, who became Pope under the name of Gregory XII. The rivals now met each other, expressing willingness to submit to the election of a foreign pontiff to the two bodies of Cardinals; but the conference was evaded, and it was evident that nothing would be accomplished by the resignation of either of the rivals.

The Cardinals then determined to call a general council at Pisa, to depose the reigning Popes, and elect one in their stead. The Council met on Lady Day, 1409; the two Popes were denounced as guilty of perjury, and, on the 5th of June, the Cardinal of Alexandria read in the Cathedral the sentence of their deposition. A task more than deposing the two rivals now lay before the Cardinals—that of choosing as their successor who should command universal obedience.

They elected Peter Philargi, of the order of Friar Minors, who took the name of Alexander V. There were three Popes, for neither of the others bowed to the decree of Pisa, and they remained at Perpignan, with the aid of Spain, while Gregory went to Avignon.

Alexander irritated his clergy by a favour to the friars, by which he gave power to hear confessions and grant indulgences in any part of Christendom. After a few months of pontificate Alexander V. died at Bologna, in 1410, and Balthasar of Castile was chosen Supreme Pontiff, with the name of John XXIII. He made war with the King of Sicily, in which he was defeated, and then made an alliance with the Emperor Sigismund, and agreed to convene a council once more; the place of meeting was Constance; it met in 1414, and was very largely attended. The Pope lived with every mark of loyalty; his council consisted of nine cardinals and about 1000 followers; the council was opened on November 5th, and adjourned to the 16th. The three principal objects for which this council had been summoned were:—[1] the union of the Church, [2] the reformation of the clergy in its head and in its members; and [3] the extirpation of erroneous theological doctrines. We have in the present article only to deal with the first of these. In spite of John's remonstrances, the Council decided to receive ambassadors from the two Anti-Popes; it was settled also that neither of the three Popes should preside in the council. The cession of John was loudly demanded, as the only means of securing peace to the Church, and his enemies proceeded to lay grievous accusations against him. At length, on March 1st, 1415, he publicly pronounced his abdication, on condition of the other two doing the same. But soon after, some difference arising between him and the Council, he fled to Schaffhausen, thence to Brissac, and so to Fribourg, where the Duke of Austria, who had declared himself his protector, treacherously made him a prisoner in his castle. Two deputies were sent from the Council to cite him to appear at Constance, and on his way there he was seized by the Emperor Sigismund and again imprisoned. Notwithstanding his remonstrances the Council solemnly deposed him, May 29th, 1415, and sentenced him to imprisonment; he was taken first to Heidelberg and afterwards to Mannheim. On July 4th, Gregory, by his proctor, Carlo Malatesta, made his renunciation in open council. Benedict still refused to submit, whereupon the Emperor Sigismund, accompanied by the Archbishop of Tours and thirteen deputies from the Council, went to Perpignan, but could not prevail on him to abdicate; so in 1417 he was deposed, and the Council proceeded to the election of a sole Pope. On Nov. 11th, 1417, they chose Otho Colonna, who took the name of Martin V. Gregory died soon after his cession, and John XXIII., on obtaining his liberty in 1419, acknowledged Martin to be head of the Church, and was in consequence made chief Cardinal, but he died six months after. There was now only the peninsula of Paniscola, in a corner of the kingdom of Arragon, which held out against the rest of Christendom, by the invincible obstinacy of Benedict, who chose to consider himself the only true Pope, till his death in 1424. Before his death he obliged his Cardinals to elect another Pope in his room, who called himself Clement VIII.; but in 1429 the King of Arragon became reconciled to Martin V., and in the same year the pretended Pope made his abdication, and thus brought to an end the Great Western Schism. The Council of Constance had also been occupied with the Hussite War [BOHEMIA; HUSS] and with WYCLIFFE [q.v.]; it was dissolved in 1418. Martin V. thus remained sole Pope; but he died very suddenly, just before the opening of the Council of Basle, in 1431. On his death the Cardinals erected themselves into a standing council, which was to be superior to the Pope, and they solemnly pledged themselves that whoever should be elected Pontiff should proceed to the reformation of the Roman Court. Their choice then fell on the Cardinal of Sienna, Gabriel Condolmieri, under the name of Eugenius IV. The Council of Basle held its first sitting July 23rd, 1431, and was presided over by the Cardinal Julian Cæsarini, in place of the Pope, who did not choose to go beyond the Alps; but not liking that the council should be held without his immediate control, he sought to transfer it from Basle to Bologna. This was refused, and the Council set to work to make some salutary Church reforms. The question of the union of the Eastern and Western Churches was coming on, and the Pope, irritated by the defiance of the Council, insisted that it should be removed to some place in Italy. He was then summoned to appear before the Council of Basle; but this he refused, and, having declared their sitting to be illegal, he summoned another to assemble at Ferrara, which was afterwards removed to Florence, where he and his adherents discussed the question of unity with the deputies in opposition to the Council of Basle. [FERRARA, COUNCIL OF; FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.] The Council of Basle now proceeded to denounce Eugenius as a disturber of the peace and unity of the Church, and on May 26th they declared him to be deposed from the pontificate, and absolved all Christians from their oaths of fealty to him, and they chose as their new Pope, Amadeus of Savoy, with the name of Felix V. He was crowned at Basle, June 24th, 1440. Eugenius was, of course, furious, and refused to accept the sentence of deposition, so once more Christendom was divided by a schism, not only between the Pope and the Anti-Pope, but between two rival Councils. It did not, however, last long. Eugenius died in 1447, and was succeeded by Thomas of Sarzana, Cardinal of Bologna, under the title of Nicholas V. He was a learned man, singularly active and conciliatory, and soon became very popular. In 1449 Felix resigned his dignity, with the consent of the Council of Basle, and Nicholas was acknowledged as sole Pontiff. The Council of Basle dispersed in the same year.

Paphnutius, Sr., was born about the year 270 in Egypt, spent the first years of his life under the direction of St. Anthony in the desert, and afterwards became Bishop in the upper Thebaid, but the name of the See is not known. During the Diocletian persecution he lost an eye, and was sent to work in the mines, but returned to his people at the accession of Constantine the Great. He was present at the Council of Nicæa, and opposed the proposal that bishops, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons who had married before their ordination should be separated from their wives. He was also present at the Councils of Tyre and Sardis in 335 and 347. He is supposed to have died about 350.

Papias.—Bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia [b. about A.D. 70, d. probably before 160].

Nothing is known of his life or work except the accounts of his writings given by Irenæus and Eusebius. Irenæus says of him that he was a disciple of St. John and the companion of Polycarp; but Eusebius questions whether Papias wrote an Interpretation of the words of the Lord about 130, all of which is lost, except some fragments quoted by the Fathers already mentioned. Eusebius tells of the strange stories of the Apostles of Christ's life and sayings, told by Papias, and says of him that he was learned and acquainted with the Scriptures, though in another passage he describes him as too much put faith in traditions. Papias seems to have believed that the future millennium was to be the return of Christ in fleshly form, and that the words of prophecy should be taken in a literal sense. He relates his interpretation of Christ's sayings many of which he declares he had received from the written tradition, among which are the instructions of our Lord to the Apostles.

Parabolani [lit. "those who imitate themselves"].—One of the minor orders of the clergy, on whom was specially laid the duty of visiting the sick and attending to their wants. They derived their name from exposing their lives to danger when ministering to the sick in cases of infectious diseases.

Paracelsus, PHILIPPUS AUREOLIUS BOERHAAVE, was born at Einsiedeln near Zurich, in 1493. He received little education in his youth, but early took to a wandering life, and travelled over all Europe, picking up information, and especially in chemistry. The most valuable contribution he made was an acquaintance with the secrets of chemistry, by which he is said to have cured thirteen princes, whose cases had been declared hopeless, before he was 33. He became famed, and in 1526, at the restoration of Æcolampadius, was Professor of Medicine and Natural Philosophy at Basel, whence, however, after two years, he was ejected on the charge of quackery. He then took to a wandering life, and died at Einsiedeln in 1541.

Paracelsus was a strong Cabalist, and believed in the doctrines of internal illumination emanating from the Deity, the harmony of all things, the influence of the stars of the sublunar world, and the powers of the elements.

Paraclete. [HOLY GHOST.]

Paradise, from a Hebrew word meaning a park, and in the LXX. as the garden of Eden, in which Adam and Eve were placed. In the later Jewish usage it was adopted as meaning that part of the world in which the souls of the faithful wait after death, and in this sense it was adopted by the Church, following the nimphs.—Those who attended the groom and bride on their wedding day. The Romans and Greeks had such persons, and the Fourth Council of Carthage [398] decreed that the bride and bridegroom were conveyed by their relations or friends to receive the priest's blessing.

"paranimph" was also used by the University of Divinity in Paris at the ceremony of the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, a doctor whose duty it was to make a commendation of those admitted to the degree.

phrase.—An explanation of some clearer terms, to elucidate to the reader the author's meaning. Paraphrases were made in very early times, the most famous being the TARGUM [q.v.], the Chaldaic version of the Pentateuch, written by different authors at different times. Paraphrases were also written on the Prophets and the books of the Old Testament, besides the Pentateuch, though it has been believed that the earliest paraphrases were paravall.—A screen or railing, either of wood or close, for separating a chapel from the rest of a church, for surrounding a altar for any similar purpose.

parere.—The act of forgiving an offender and removing the guilt of sin, that the punishment may not be inflicted. Of the word pardon, it may be observed that it represents it by various phrases: "a blotting out," "a taking away," "a blotting out of the record of iniquity," etc. The author or grantor of pardon is not any creature, angel or God. Ministers are said to remit debt, but not authoritatively; that is, they can only declare that there is remission through Christ, but they cannot pretend to grant it. There is nothing that man has, or can do, by which pardon can be procured: it cannot be bought; human works cannot merit it; nor can water-baptism wash away sin. It is the prerogative of God alone to pardon; the first cause of which is His sovereign grace and mercy. The meritorious cause is the Blood of Christ. Pardon and justification are considered by some as the same thing, and it must be confessed that there is a close connection; in many parts they agree, and it is without doubt that every sinner who shall be found pardoned at the Great Day will likewise be justified; yet they have been distinguished thus: [1] An innocent person, when falsely accused and acquitted, is justified but not pardoned; and a criminal may be pardoned, though he cannot be justified or declared innocent. Pardon is of men that are sinners, and who remain such, though pardoned sinners; but justification is a pronouncing persons righteous, as if they had never sinned. [2] Pardon frees from punishment, but does not entitle to everlasting life; but justification does. If we were only pardoned, we should, indeed, escape the pains of hell, but could have no claim to the joys of heaven; for these are more than the most perfect works of man could merit, therefore they must be what the Scripture declares "the gift of God." After all, however, though these two may be distinguished, yet they cannot be separated; and in reality one is not prior to the other; for he that is pardoned by the death of Christ, is at the same time justified by His life.

Paris, MATTHEW OF. [MATTHEW PARIS.]

Parish [Gr. paroikia, "a sojourning"].—The portion of land under the spiritual control of a priest. The name was originally applied to the sojourning of the Jews in Egypt, and was thence transferred to the communities of Christians dwelling among strangers at Rome or elsewhere. The credit of introducing the system into England is generally ascribed to Theodore of Tarsus, Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 690, though others think that the parish is simply the old "township" of the early Teutons [see Green's Hist., vol. i. p. 8]. However this may be, Theodore certainly laid the foundation of the ecclesiastical parish, by introducing the principle of patronage which had been laid down in the East by Justinian's laws of 541 and 543, according the rights of patronage to the founders of churches and their heirs. The system of parishes was used after the organisation of the Church in England to denote the territory governed by a bishop, and consisting of several churches or chapels dependent upon the mother church of the diocese. At first the mother churches were distinguished from others by containing baptisteries, in which the Sacrament of baptism was administered at stated times with elaborate ceremonial; the baptismal churches were each in the care of an archpresbyter, who held a position somewhat resembling that now held by a rural dean. In course of time, as the number of baptismal churches increased, presbyters were appointed to the charge of each, and were entitled to receive tithes. We find that land was now divided into districts corresponding to "hundreds" in charge of the presbyters, and in larger divisions corresponding to our counties, in charge of the bishops. With the increase of population came the necessity for increasing the number of churches and chapels. In Queen Anne's reign an Act was passed for building fifty new churches, to which parishes were to be allotted, in London. And occasionally local Acts were passed for the division of large parishes. But it was not until 1818 that the first Church Building Act was made. That Act provided that a parish might be divided either into distinct parishes, or into districts, or into chapelries. The arrangement was under the control of the CHURCH BUILDING COMMISSIONERS [q.v.]. They were empowered, with the consent of the bishop, to apply to the patron for his consent to the division. The boundaries were to be marked out, and might be altered from time to time by Order in Council. Glebe, tithe, and other endowments might be apportioned with the consent of the bishop and patron. Other Acts were passed in 1831 and in 1846. The latter provided for the making new parishes through the agency of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are empowered to provide for the stipends of the new incumbents by alienating fees and other endowments. In cases where the income of a new parish is below a certain sum, the advowson may be obtained by private trustees on their finding a sufficient sum to raise the permanent income. When a new parish is formed out of an old one, the inhabitants for all ecclesiastical purposes belong to the new parish, and have no right to seats in the old parish church. But they have a right to vote for churchwardens of the mother church.

Parish Books.—Documents belonging to a parish, kept by the churchwardens or clerk, in which all matters relating to parish affairs are recorded, as well as notices of services, registers, and church accounts.

Parish Clerk.—The lowest officer of the church, of whom there is one in every parish. The clerks were formerly really clergymen in minor orders, who assisted the officiating priests, but are now laymen. Their duties are to lead the responses, be present at all christenings, marriages, and funerals, etc. They are generally appointed by the minister, except in some places where it is a custom for the parishioners or churchwardens to appoint them. After being appointed they are licensed by the ordinary, and are sworn to obey the minister.

Parker, JOHN HENRY [s. 1806, d. 1884].—A learned writer on church architecture, as well as an active controversialist in ecclesiastical questions. He entered into a discussion with Lord Selborne as to the binding character of the ANGLICANISM [q.v.]. His manuals of Gothic architecture are probably the best in the language.

Parker, MATTHEW, Archbishop of Canterbury [s. at Norwich, 1504; d. at Lambeth, 1575]. He studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, of which he was made Fellow in 1527, and afterwards devoted himself to some time to the study of Church history and theology. The result was his declaring himself in 1533, in a sermon preached before the University, to have accepted the Roman doctrines. He became Chaplain to Jane Boleyn, Master of Corpus Christi College in 1544, and in the following year Vice-Chancellor; on the accession of Edward VI. he was also presented to the Deanery of Lambeth, but lost this and all his other appointments when Mary became Queen. Her death took place within a few hours of that of Reginald Pole, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the new Queen, Elizabeth, nominated Parker's Polish successor, moved, no doubt, not only by the sense of his moderation between extreme parties, but also by the remembrance of the relation in which he had stood to her mother.

His consecration, which took place on the 17th, 1559, became the subject of a strange fable, known as the Nag's Head Consecration, which was an invention of the Romanists, set forth for the purpose of deriding his consecration, and thereby violating the orders of the Church of England. The story has long since been abundantly refuted, and has been given up by the last authorities among the Romanists; it was as follows:—The Queen issued her warrant, directed to the Bishop of Llandaff; to Dr. Scory, elect of Hereford; Dr. Barlow, elect of Chester; Dr. Coverdale, elect of Exeter; and to Dr. Hodgkins, Suffragan of Bath. All these persons met at the Nag's Head Tavern in Cheapside, where it was usual for the Bishops of the Arches, and the civilians, to wash themselves after the confirmation of a bishop in Bow Church; and there Neale, who was Chaplain to Bonner, peeped through a hole in the door, and saw all the other bishops importuning Llandaff, who had been forbidden by Bonner from assisting in the consecration. As he obstinately refused their request, Dr. Scory bid the rest kneel down, and, laying the Bible on each of their shoulders and heads, he pronounced the words "Take this authority, etc.," and so they all consecrated the bishop. The Romanists asserted that the consecration was irregular, both as to the place where it was performed and as to the manner of doing it; they also objected that three of the four bishops present were only bishops elect, and that the other was a college. The story could not have been invented after the Queen's reign, for, had it been true, doubtless some of the writers of the time would have noticed it. Bishop Hall discovered the falsity of the story in an original manuscript attached to Fisher's registers, showing that the consecration took place in Lambeth Palace Chapel, on Sunday

ck in the morning, in a scarlet gown
, attended by the said four bishops,

ed intensely, graduated at the Divinity

School at Harvard with high honours, and became minister of a church at Boston. His Unitarian brethren soon found that he was leaving the conservative line of such men as Channing, and was being moved along in the direction of freethought, and they drew apart from him. This grew to an open breach when, in 1841, he published a sermon in which he treated the Gospel miracles as either myths or exaggerations. The result of the controversy which arose was that he left the Unitarian body with a large following, who established themselves under him as an independent congregation [1845]. His congregations were large, and his influence, from his manifest zeal for philanthropy and social reforms, was very wide. His testimony against slavery had great power in its abolition. He was a prolific writer, and his sermons are devout, earnest, and thoughtful. His works, comprising, besides these and other discourses, reviews, criticisms, and speeches, were published in London in twelve volumes, 1863-1865. He also published a translation of De Wette's Introduction to the Old Testament.
His health failing, he came to Europe for change, but died at Florence.

Parker's position with respect to the Bible miracles, as indicated in his works, can hardly be said to deny them. "Non-proven" would perhaps express his view: they are improbable, and the evidence insufficient, but cannot be called impossible. The truth of Christ's moral teaching, nay, even His Divinity, in a sense unapproached by any other human personality, were evidenced by the sanctity of His life. Legends gradually grew round the beauty of His figure in the history; these being dropped, a true biography remains. Parker's faith in a personal God who governs the soul and the daily life of man, to whom prayer can be made, and who will answer it, seems not to have wavered. His private papers contain many direct and most earnest petitions to God. The Bible, according to him, is inspired, not in the sense of a revelation, but as calling forth in man the latent inspiration which is in him, and leading him to discern the truth which is given to every man, but which, but for such quickening, lies hidden.

Parkhurst, JOHN, Biblical Lexico-grapher [b. 1728, d. 1797], born at Catesby Abbey, Northamptonshire, died at Epsom.
He took orders in the Church of England, but soon retired on his means, and betook himself to Biblical study. He first published his Hebrew Lexicon without Points [1762], and followed it by his Greek Lexicon in 1769.
He was a partisan of the Hutchinsonian school, and this largely affected the value of his work. The peculiar opinions of that school led him to attach great value to etymological researches, and his own in the Greek are in the highest degree fanciful. But in spite of their faults, the learning and industry of Parkhurst, no less than his piety, gave a real value to his books, and the edition revised by the late Hugh J. Rose, and first published in 1829, is a book of enduring worth, though other works have largely superseded it.

Parochial Boards have been put forward as one of the needs of Church Reform. One scheme, that of Mr. Albert Grey, as spokesman of the Church Reform Union, was to leave each parish to choose its board—all ratepayers having a vote—which should regulate the hours of service, the ritual, and the choice of hymn-books, all subject to the veto of the Bishop. Another recommendation was that the Board should consist of communicants only. The Committee of the Upper House of Convocation on the subject reported as follows:—

“While we give full weight to the desire that has been expressed for the admission of the faithful laity of the Church, of all classes, to a substantial share in the control of Church affairs, we still feel that we require to be more fully informed as to the extent to which it is deemed to be desirable that the laity should share in the administration of the affairs of the Church. We look for valuable information and assistance in this, as in other matters, from the newly-constituted House of Laymen.

“Meanwhile we recommend the formation of voluntary parochial boards or councils, which, we are all well aware, have been recommended in many dioceses, and have been in operation in many parishes. It is otherwise as regards parochial boards or councils with defined statutory powers. The formation of these we cannot, as at present advised, recommend, until the principles on which they are to be founded shall have been fully considered by the Synods of the Church, and shall have received their general approval.

“It must always be remembered that parochial boards, however constituted, can only properly be regarded as a portion of a still further development of conciliar Church government. But this development can only be brought about by degrees, and by the steady progress of organised growth.”

Parochiale.—A book of occasional offices for parish priests.

Parsees.—Parseeism was the religion of Iran or Persia. Its origin is wrapped in obscurity; even the date of Zoroaster, or Zarathustra, is fixed variously between 500 or 600 B.C. and 1200 B.C. The fundamental doctrines probably were formed 2,000 years B.C., whilst Persians and Hindoos were still one nation, and before the Veda existed, which is generally fixed at 1,500 years B.C. The first historic record is found in the arrow-head inscriptions of about 516 B.C., in which Darius Hystaspes figures as a disciple of the prophet, and ascribes his victories to Ormuzd. At the present time there is but a small congregation of Parsees living in Yezd and Kirmest have emigrated. There are many of similarity to be found in the Jews and Parsees: both are monotheists, both exiles, and both are followers of an sacred law.

The book which contains their sacred law is called Avesta, which comes from the root vid, “to know,” and the suffix -ta, “law and revelation.” It is sometimes properly called Zend-Avesta; zend meaning “commentary” or “glossary,” which accompanied each part of the book as a help to understanding. The Avesta was not of only one man or time; some of it date back to between the seventh and fourth centuries before Christ, and some as late as the fourth century after. It is divided into Yasna, which includes five gâthas, or hymns, written in a dialect resembling Vedic and probably very ancient; the Vidvâd, which means “given against the demons,” contains the laws; the Visparad, “prayers,” a collection of prayers; and the Sad, sections with special prayers. The Avesta came to Persia through Media by some of that race who were the first to worship the infant Saviour. It was the ruling religion of Persia in A.D. 224, when Ardeshîr, the first Sassanide monarch, remained so till 642, when the Persian empire came to an end. Then many had accepted the Koran; yet a small number remained, and were the progenitors of the modern community of Indian Parsees, who went to India, in 716, and settled in the northern part.

Besides being monotheistic, Parseeism is dualistic. It teaches the existence of two principles, always at war with each other, light and darkness, good and evil—and names them ORMUZD or AHRIMAN. These two were supposed to be living in different parts of the universe, an immense space separating them, till, becoming aware of the existence of the other, a fierce war was waged between them. Ormuzd commenced creating spirits suitable for his purposes against his enemy, and then Ahriman created evil spirits to counteract the influence of Ormuzd. Ormuzd next made the stars and planets, and when the earth was finished, he placed it between himself and Ahriman; the latter bored a hole through the earth and placed some of his bad spirits on it. From that time forth the earth became the arena of the struggle between good and evil. Zoroaster was then created by Ormuzd to combat Ahriman. The struggle is to last for 12,000 years. Each man is to live his allotted time on the earth, there to determine his own happiness; for the Parsee believes in the resurrection of the dead, and in a state of blessedness. Fifty-seven years before the end of the world—which is to be brought about by a collision with a comet—Sôshyans, lage.—Strictly speaking a parish th the house and land belonging to nerally used to denote the house for the residence of the incumbent, ing to the church. The residences y have gone through many changes, undoubtedly, before attaining their present substantially equal character. In the Middle Ages many churches were served from neighbouring monasteries; in such case the priest walked over each day, entered the chancel by the priest's door, took the vestments, books, vessels, etc., out of the aumbries, and having robed himself in the presence of the congregation, began the service. If the distance was greater, he passed the night in the church, so as to be ready for the morning service. The "parvis," or room over the porch, which is found so often in old churches, was fitted as a priest's chamber. Sometimes he had a lodging in the tower, and occasionally the room which was so used is found in old churches with its fireplace still remaining. In this Parson's Room were generally stored the records of the manorial courts—documents of no small importance, inasmuch as they included evidence of land transfers; the only evidence indeed forthcoming in a simple state of society, when elaborate conveyancing was unknown.

In consequence of the clergy being celibate, and their frequent residence within the walls of the religious houses, very few specimens indeed remain of mediæval parsonages. Those that still exist have been so altered that nothing can be known accurately about their original character. In all cases they were, no doubt, small and lowly. The wealth of the Church was stored in the monasteries. And yet the parson was styled "Sir." In the parish church of Margate are brasses of two priests of the fifteenth century who are styled "Sir Thomas Smyth" and "Sir Thomas Cardyff." That the country priests were poor and lowly appears from Chaucer's account of the Parson in his "Prologue," and in the town we have just named records show that the parson of the parish church held a much lower social position than the "Prior of Salmestone," a religious house within the parish. Some mediæval parsonages in the border counties were constructed with walls suitable for the enclosure of cattle, and intended for them to be driven into on the outbreak of one of the frequent border frays.

For some time after the Reformation the parsonages seem to have been still humble dwellings. The vicious habit of non-residence did not tend to improve them. The pluralist rectors who lived at their canonries or in their fattest parsonages, and left the rest to their poor curates, could not but contribute to the depression of the social condition of the clergy as a body. Lord Macaulay's famous description of the "Levites" of the days of Charles II. is, no doubt, an exaggeration if applied to the whole body. There was no lack of learning as well as of moral worth even in the darkest days, but as a rule it would seem that the resident clergy were of humble rank and manners. Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield is very popular with us all. And if it be objected to him on one hand that he is far behind his successors of these days in social condition, it may be said on the other that he is of simpler tastes. Just the same thing may be said of the country gentry or the country shopkeepers. We have all moved on since the days of Dr. Primrose. What may be regarded as still more remarkable is that all through the charming story there is not a hint anywhere of any sort of parochial ministration. The country parsonage has certainly become more of a parish rendezvous since then. Even down to the present century it was considered out of the question that a clergyman of good family should live among his people. The law of the present day requires residence; the incomes of the clergy are more equalised, and a far larger number have a competence. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have done much to provide residences by making grants from the funds at their disposal for the purpose.

Parsons, Rev. [PERSONS.]

Partial Indulgence, in the Roman Church, is the remission of only a part of the punishment due to forgiven sins. An indulgence granted as plenary will, if there be an obstacle to its full effect, be only partially obtained. [INDULGENCES; PLENARY INDULGENCES.]

Partibus, BISHOPS IN.—A title given to bishops holding foreign titles, who have been employed on special duties in England. Sometimes they served monasteries which were exempt from diocesan jurisdiction, sometimes they were consecrated for the help of infirm diocesans. Cnut, and his successors, introduced Danish bishops for their own countrymen. Bishop Stubbs gives a list of not less than sixty-two Irish bishops who acted as suffragans of English dioceses. There are bishops named in the same learned and valuable work as assisting at English consecrations and exercising other functions, of Damascus, of Laodicea, of Corbavia (in Dalmatia), of Sardis, of Scutari, of Nazareth, etc., etc. [Stubbs's Registrum, pp. 142-149.] During the great Papal Schism the rival parties had bishops, and some of these occur in the records of episcopal work in England. After the Reformation it became unlawful for any Roman Catholic bishop to hold any English territorial title, and consequently these prelates became "bishops in partibus." Thus Dr. Wiseman, who had charge of London, etc., was known as "Bishop of Melipotamus in partibus infidelium." The event known as the Papal Aggression in 1850 was the reconstitution of England by the Pope into new sees, when Dr. Wiseman was appointed Archbishop of Westminster. The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill was passed, making it penal to use this title, but it has since been repealed, and, therefore, the Roman bishops are no longer called bishops in partibus.

Particular Baptists. [BAPTISTS]

Pasagians.—A sect which appeared in Lombardy towards the close of the twelfth century, and which grew out of a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. They continued to observe the whole of the Mosaic Law except the sacrifices, and denied the equality of the Trinity. They were also sometimes called Circumcisi. The name "pasagians" is derived either from passagieri, "birds of passage," from the wandering life they led; or from pasagium, "journey," a word which was often used to designate pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulchre, and more particularly the Crusades.

Pascal, Blaise [b. 1623, d. 1662], born at Clermont, in Auvergne, the son of Stephen Pascal, of an old and distinguished family. His father had four children, of whom only Blaise and two sisters grew to maturity. One sister survived to write her brother's life, the other took the veil in the convent of Port Royal. Their mother dying in 1626, Stephen Pascal gave up his offices in Auvergne and went to live at Paris, where he spent his time in carefully educating his children. It was a time of much fermentation of thought, the time of transition from the old philosophy to the new. Bacon died the same year as young Pascal's mother. His Norum Organum, published six years before, was no less than an epoch in the history of science. Mathematics and natural philosophy were cultivated in Italy, England, and France. Stephen Pascal became a geometrician, and cultivated the society of the ablest men in Parisian society; they met in each other's houses, and opened correspondence with other philosophers, and kept abreast of all discoveries which were being made in physics. This was the origin of the Academy of Sciences in 1666.

Young Pascal used to attend these conferences, and to listen eagerly. When only eleven years old he wrote a treatise on sound, in which he sought to explain why a plate struck with a knife gives forth a sound which a touch of the hand stops. His father feared that this taste might interfere with his study of languages, and decided that mathematics should not form the subject of conversation when his friends came. Blaise was in such grief that his father promised him that after he had learned Greek and Latin he would teach him geometry, telling him generally that it comprised the measurement of bodies in length, breadth, and thickness, and taught him to make them in a just and precise manner. Meditating on these definitions the boy, by comparing the position of lines, and inventing a nomenclature of his own, for he knew not the names of the figures which he secretly drew on the floor, arrived at many truths enunciated by Euclid. One day his father surprised him just as he had, by his unaided study, arrived at the discovery that the three angles of a triangle are equal to ght angles. In delight he resolved to no more obstacles in his way, and gave Euclid, which he very soon mastered, as recognised as a worthy member of council of savans. By the time he was 1 he had written a treatise on conic sections, which excited the admiration of the Des Cartes, and from that time onwards continued to make astonishing progress.

about the year 1647, while living at Port Royal, whither his father had removed six years before, Pascal began to be deeply affected by religious anxieties. He felt that his actual pursuits did not satisfy his soul's thirst that without communion with the Father the soul cannot find peace. A friend showed him the works of Arnauld [Port Royalists], and from that time Christianity, which had been little in his thoughts, became a living reality to him, and he succeeded with earnestness in converting his father and his brothers to his own views and principles. In 1648 his father died; one sister was already dead, and the other, Jacqueline, went to Port Royal, and Pascal returned to Paris. While he gave himself to his studies, but his health, always feeble, quite broke down, and his physicians forbade him to continue.

The result was that he gave himself to study and amusements, to the grief of his mother Jacqueline, who entreated him to withdraw from the world. So far from acquiescing in meditating marriage, when a narrow boat was hurled into the Seine from a bridge, way carriage was accepted by him as a means to turn from the world. From that time he sought the close friendship of those who were connected with the Abbey of Port Royal, then at the height of its fame. The year 1656, by Arnauld, of two letters in favour of Jansen [JANSENISTS] in the midst of the rage of the Jesuits against him, they moved for his expulsion from the province. While the case was pending he wrote the first of his Provincial Letters in his friend's defence. It was so well written that he wrote the rest, eighteen in all; their popularity was amazing; full of wit and irony, yet of reverence and eloquence, as he said of them, "They are models of wit and pleasure and pleasantry. The best comedies of the French have not more fun, Bossuet is not so sublime."

was Pascal's last complete work. He wrote an apologetic treatise on Christianity; but his physical sufferings were so increasing that he was only able to jot down some time to time on separate pieces of paper the thoughts which he intended to elaborate. Increasingly excruciating headaches, borne with beautiful patience, prevented his going further. At the age of eighteen he had never been without suffering, yet he had attained the rank of a first-rate mathematician, and he had written his brilliant Provincial Letters. He died at the early age of thirty-nine.

Paschal Controversies [Gr. pascha, "passover"].—These were controversies which arose in the middle of the second century on the question of the proper date for keeping Easter. The term "pascha" was in the first ages of the Church applied to the anniversary of our Saviour's death [cf. 1 Cor. v. 7]. After a time Easter became included in this term, but at length the "pascha," as an ecclesiastical term, was confined to Easter alone, Good Friday being excluded. The Churches in Asia Minor used to celebrate the Paschal Supper, or anniversary of the Crucifixion, on the 14th day of the month of Nisan, the date of the Jewish Passover; and three days later they kept Easter, regardless of what day of the week it fell upon. The practice of Rome, and of the majority of the Churches, was always to keep Easter on the Sunday, and the Paschal Supper on its eve. The former custom—called the "quartodeciman," from its being kept on the fourteenth day—was claimed as derived from St. John and St. Philip; the latter from St. Peter and St. Paul. About the year 158 Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, visited Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, and discussed this question with him in a friendly spirit; the result was that it was agreed that a difference of practice was allowable on this point. But about the year 196, Victor, Bishop of Rome, sought to enforce uniformity of practice, by threatening to cut off communion with the Asiatic Churches unless they submitted to the Western custom. His efforts, however, were doomed to failure. Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, writing on behalf of the Asiatics, refused to yield to Victor, and when the latter sought to cut off so large a body of people from Christian communion he was opposed by many Western bishops, among others by Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons. In 314 the Council of Arles decreed that Easter should in all places be kept "on one day, and at one time;" but the Council had no jurisdiction in the East, and therefore did not affect the Asiatics. But in the Council of Nicæa the bishops from Asia Minor consented to conform to the Western and more general custom of keeping Easter; and although individual congregations resisted this surrender, yet the controversy was then at an end, and by the sixth century all traces of the Quartodecimans had disappeared.

Paschal Festival, or Easter, observed in commemoration of the Resurrection of our Lord, is regarded as the chief among the great festivals of the Church. From primitive times it has been the occasion of great rejoicing. Some ancient writers give to Easter Sunday the name of Dominica gaudii, "the Lord's day of joy." Public games and shows were interdicted in order that the festival might be generally celebrated with rejoicings of a religious character. Easter was the most usual time for the administration of baptism; and while this was administered with peculiar solemnity, the other offices and rites of the Church were celebrated with special manifestations of joyfulness and praise. The general joy was further increased by the custom of releasing from prison all except the worst offenders, and also by the choice made of this season as a suitable one in which to give freedom to slaves, and to do special acts of kindness and liberality to the poor.

Paschal II. was the successor in the Papacy of Gregory VII. [1099], and carried on that Pontiff's warfare against the Emperor Henry IV., not with entire success. That Emperor died in 1106, and was succeeded by his son, Henry V., who, though he was pledged to support the Pope, became a fierce opponent. After much struggling Henry was so far victorious that he took Paschal prisoner, forced him to crown him, and to acknowledge the Imperial right of investiture. These concessions so angered the clergy that they demanded the annulling of the oath, but Paschal remained faithful to it. Thereupon several Synods pronounced sentence of excommunication against the Emperor. The latter marched upon Rome, fearing the Pope would give way. Paschal fled from the city, and soon afterwards died [1118].

Paschasius Radbertus.—A celebrated divine. His family name was Rathbert, but, following the custom of the time in which he lived, he added a Latin to a barbarian name. He was born at Soissons at the end of the eighth century, and was educated in the monastery of Notre Dame in the same town. He received the tonsure there, but for some reason, which is not very clear, he gave up the religious for the secular life. But this did not last long. Under the influence of Abelard, Abbot of Corbie, he took full vows, and from that time devoted himself to the work of the monastery. He was one of the chief instructors, and spent much time in studying the writings of the early Christian Fathers. In 822, under the direction of Paschasius, a new monastery was founded, of which, on the death of Abelard in 825, he became the Abbot. He now began to write. In 830 he published the Life of Abelard, his master and patron, and in the following year wrote a tract, teaching a doctrine which has since become one of the principal articles of faith in the Roman Church—that of Transubstantiation. He maintained [1] that the Eucharist is the true Body and Blood of Christ, [2] that no trace of the substances of bread and wine remain after the consecration, [3] that it is the same flesh that was born of the Virgin Mary. He quoted in this tract passages from the writings of Cyprian, Irenæus, Augustine, Chrysostom, and others which he considered supported theory. As was natural, such a startling trine was the cause of much and fierce controversy. The most famous of Paschal's opponents was Frudegard, who is supposed by some writers to have been one of the monks of Corbie. Another monk, Ratram, addressed a long letter to the King, Charles the Good, on the subject, trying to prove that the first arguments put forth by Paschasius were sound, but that he was unable to agree with the third. Paschasius's other works were commentaries on the Lamentations of Jeremiah and the 44th Psalm, and on St. Matthew's Pasculorynchites (from the pasculus, "a gag," and rynchos, "a maul"). A branch of the MONTANISTS (q.v.) who spoke, and kept their fingers constantly in their mouths. They grounded their practice on the words of the Psalmist, "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips" [Ps. cxli. 3]. They arose in the third century, and St. Jerome testifies that at his time he found some of them in France as he travelled to Ancyra.

PASSAU, TREATY OF.—This was a treaty of pacification with the Protestants gained for them in 1552 from Charles Maurice, Elector of Saxony. It is known by the German Protestants as the Peace of Passau for their religious liberty. By the three articles it was stipulated that Maximilian the confederates should lay down their arms and should lend their troops to Ferdinand of Hungary to defend him against the Turks, and that the Landgrave of Hesse, who had been treacherously imprisoned, should be set at liberty. In the fourth it was agreed that the Rule of Faith called INTERIM (q.v.) should be considered as null and void, that the contending parties should enjoy the free and undisturbed exercise of their religion, a diet should be assembled to determine amicably the present disputes; and that religious liberty should continue always, in case that it should be found impossible to come to an uniformity in doctrine and worship. Also that the Imperial Chamber at Spire should be open to the Protestants as to the Catholics, and that there should always be a certain number of the latter for persuasion at that high court.

Passing-bell.—The custom of tolling a bell on the death of a person is a very old one. The sound of the bell calls for the prayers of the faithful on behalf of the deceased person. The usage is referred to by the Venerable Bede, and is thus directed by him [Ecc. ii. 17]:—"When any person is passing out of this life, a bell shall be tolled, and the bells shall not then slack to do his last duty."

ionists, THE, or “Congregation of Discalced Clerks of the Most Holy Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ.” The Order was founded by St. Paul of the Cross, who was born near Genoa in 1694; devoted himself to a religious life, and founded the Order in 1720, with the sanction of Pope Innocent XIII. or Gastinara, Bishop of Alexandria. The following year he went to Rome to obtain the Pope's sanction, and having been there some years, during which he remained a priest, the first monastery of the Order was established at Monte Cassino in 1737. The rules of the society were confirmed by Benedict XIV. in 1741, and by Clement XIV. in 1769. The Order resided at SS. Giovanni e Paolo, on the Tiber, in 1775. The Order spread after the founder's death, and first obtained a footing in this country in 1842. There are now 120 ionist houses in England, two in Ireland and one in Scotland. The Order was introduced into the United States in 1852, and now have six houses there.

Passionists fast three days in every week, besides Advent and Lent. In addition to the usual vows they take a fourth: they will do their utmost to keep alive in the hearts of the faithful the memory of our Lord's Passion. Their dress is black, with the Crucifix printed on the left side, and a heart suspended from the neck with a cross upon it.

ion Sunday.—The fifth Sunday in Lent, the second Sunday before Easter. It is called because the commemoration of Christ's Passion begins with the Gospel for this Sunday. In the north of England it is frequently called Carling Sunday, and celebrated by eating of parched peas or “carlings.” A rhyme thus refers to the Sundays in Lent: Easter Day:

Wed, Palm, and paste (i.e., pasch) egg day.”*

The week in Lent is popularly known as Holy Week. [HOLY WEEK.] From the times it has been observed with greater strictness than the rest of the fast. The whole of the Passion is read in the lessons for this week. The term seems to have been first applied to the fortnight before Easter, so that the Passion week began with Palm Sunday instead of with Palm Sunday. It is used in this larger sense by the Greeks of Laodicea.

ionophoria.—In the Eastern Church, offerings attached to churches near the altar, to receive objects connected with the altar; in fact, the same as the sacristy.

or [Lat. “a shepherd”].—A term applied to members of all orders of the clergy, as “shepherds” of Christ's flock.

EL.—26

It was restricted by Archbishop Laud to the episcopal order, and is used in this narrower sense by the Prayer Book in the first Ember prayer, and in the first Collect in the form for the consecration of bishops.

Pastorale.—A book of occasional Offices relating to confession and other pastoral duties of clergy of the Church of Rome.

Pastoral Letter.—A letter written by a bishop to his diocese.

Pastoral Staff or Crosier.—A bishop's official emblem. It is a long staff with a hook at the end, like a shepherd's crook, and is the symbol of the bishop's pastoral authority over his flock. It is frequently beautifully decorated with gold and jewels, and sometimes has a small banner or sudarium attached to the upper part. It was formerly borne by bishops and abbots. A bishop carried it in his left hand, with the crook turned outwards, to indicate his authority over his diocese; an abbot in his right hand, with the crook turned inwards, to signify his jurisdiction over the members of his house. In the Prayer Book of 1549 the use of the pastoral staff is enjoined as follows:—“Whensoever the bishop shall celebrate the Holy Communion in the church, or execute any other public ministration, he shall have. . . his pastoral staff in his hand, or else borne or holden by his chaplain.”

Pastoral Theology.—That branch of the science of theology which has reference to the intercourse of the minister with his people. In his study he is to become acquainted with the Scriptures and the doctrines of the Church; in his pastorate he has to apply what he has learned to the varying needs of his flock, in the ministry of the Word and the Sacraments. Such work involves, primarily, visitation of the sick, pastoral converse and guidance, teaching in schools, preparation of candidates for confirmation, communicants' classes, enlisting lay co-operation and guiding it, attention to clubs and other parochial institutions, as well as to parish festivals, and endeavouring to sanctify all by the name of the Lord Jesus.

The discharge of these duties involves questions concerning which difference of opinion is sure to exist. Thus the preface of the Prayer Book requires the minister “being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably hindered,” to say the morning and evening prayers in church. Now certainly there can be little doubt that the daily service ought to be said where there is a prospect of its being regularly maintained and fairly attended. Probably few English towns now are without a daily service in one of the churches. But in parishes where the clergyman is single handed, it may fairly be pleaded for him that he is reasonably hindered. When he has once begun he will be unwilling to let it be interrupted on account of indisposition or absence from home, and thus it threatens to be a strain on his health and a restraint on his needful recreation. The religious teaching in schools claims much attention, but most of all the great increase of population makes pastoral work much heavier than it was three centuries ago. Moreover, in religious families of the upper classes (and the poor cannot find time to leave their daily labour) family prayers have taken the part of the Church service, and these have the advantage of bringing together the whole household.

The following books on Pastoral Theology may be recommended. Blunt's Duties of the Parish Priest, Evans's Bishopric of Souls, Handford's Parochialia, How's Pastor in Parochia, and A Manual of Pastoral Visitation.

Paten, Patena, or Discus.—The plate or vessel on which the consecrated bread of the Eucharist is placed, from which it is distributed to the communicants.

Paterines.—The origin of the name is unknown, but some suppose it to come from "pateria," which signifies in the Milanese dialect a popular faction, and that the opponents of the clergy were so called because of their popularity. But the name was also given to a branch of the Manicheans who migrated from Bulgaria to Italy in 1046. They taught that matter was essentially evil, condemned marriages, and set at naught Church authority. They are supposed to be the same as the Pseverati [q.v.] and are also identified with the Cathari or Puritans who infected Languedoc at the end of the twelfth century.

Pater Noster.—The Lord's Prayer. These are the first two words of the Lord's Prayer in Latin.

Patriarch.—This title, borrowed from the Jews, was originally given to all bishops. But, by the fifth century, the title had become restricted to the bishops of a few of the most eminent cities of the Empire, who exercised some jurisdiction over the other metropolitans of their district. The term is first used in this confined sense by the ecclesiastical historian Sozrates, A.D. 440, and authoritatively by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. The Bishops of Rome, Alexandria and Antioch, as the heads of Churches of Apostolic foundation, claimed the title in a special sense; but with these were generally associated the Bishops of Constantinople and Jerusalem, the former from the political, and the latter from the religious, importance of his See. The powers of the patriarchs varied in different parts. They presided at the local councils, and claimed the right of consecrating, and sometimes also of nominating, the metropolitans and inferior bishops of their province, and, in fact, exercised the supervision of their district generally.

Patrick, St.—The Apostle of Ireland. According to St. Patrick himself, who mentions the fact in his Confession, he was born Monavem of Tabernise, a locality which is probably to be identified with Kilpatrick in Scotland. Another passage in the Confession gives the date as close to the end of the fourth century; but there is some doubt about the genuineness of this, and several writers place the birth some years earlier. His father's name was Calpornius, and he was of a good family. His mother's name was Concham, who, tradition says, was a niece of St. Martin of Tours. His parents were both Christians, and took great pains with the education of their boy, though at first their efforts seem to have been attended with little result. The country at that time was infested by brigands and robbers, a gang of whom carried off Patrick from his father's ground when only a child. He was taken to Ireland and sold as a slave, his master obliging him to spend his whole time, no matter what the weather might be, in tending the cattle on the mountains. After enduring terrible hardships for six months, he succeeded in making his escape. He went directly to the sea in the hope of finding back to his native land. He found a ship, but was not allowed to go aboard in consequence of having no money. He turned ever to despair, but, though heathens, the sailors took pity on him and gave him a few pence. Three days after they landed him in Scotland, but at the extreme north, so that he was obliged to wander about for some time, always in danger of being again taken prisoner. He at last reached home, and was left at peace for a time. Meanwhile he had a dream in which he was told that he had been chosen as God's messenger for the conversion of Ireland. His movements about this time are uncertain, because the different versions of his life do not agree in many particulars. Some say that he travelled a great deal on the Continent before beginning his missionary duties. His own account, however, if it could be sure that the passage is genuine, says that he was ordained in Scotland, and spent many years there in retirement as the best means of preparing himself for his great work. Probably this is quite correct. His parents and friends were greatly opposed to his taking orders, and tried by every means in their power to dissuade him. Some urged that he would thereby expose himself to unnecessary dangers from the heathens, others that, owing to faults committed in his youth, he was unworthy of such a holy office. But he remained true to the vision he had seen, believing that he had a mission to the Irish from God. He found the whole country given up to idolatry, and immediately set himself earnestly to work. He was of a cheerful disposition, and used to venture into the most wild districts. At all the places where he stopped to preach, he left behind converts.

returning again afterwards to establish a Church. His labours were attended with greater success than expected. He was not, however, without opposition. His most remarkable success was a Prince of Wales named as we can make out from the records extant, Coroticus must have lived and come upon Patrick during his missionary journeys. He was holding a confirmation, he consecrated a congregation, and carried off a captive.

His labours in later years at all ranks as the metropolitan and he established other distant parts of the country. Over several councils which he presided over the discipline of the Church. The laws issued by him still remain in force in Down in Ulster, at what is called the generally recognised baptism of the Kings of Ireland, and converted the whole of Ireland to a few insignificant islands.

to which we have already referred appears to be unquestionably true, though there are various manuscripts which throw some passages. A copy kept at the time of the controversy surrounds his life while the Roman Catholics regard him as a devoted son of their Church. Theologians strenuously oppose the Bishop Wordsworth did at St. Patrick knew nothing of Transubstantiation, or the Virgin.

Dr. Johnson, author of many excellent divinity and expository works, was born at Gainsborough in Lincolnshire. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he became a Fellow in 1731. He was ordained by Dr. Hall, the Bishop of Norwich, in 1751, and became Vicar of Battersea [1758], Rector of St. Martin's [1762], Prebendary of Exeter [1762], Dean of Peterborough [1769], and Bishop of Chichester [1789].

He died in 1797. The foundation of Bishop Johnson's commentaries, which were published between 1788-1795. He also wrote Life of the Pilgrim, Exposition of the Commandments, The Friendly Christian Sacrifice, The Devout Communicant, The Popish Conversions, and is considered as one of the most able writers of the eighteenth century, and as inclined to denying the existence of any duality in God, affirmed that the Father, the one primary Principle, must have suffered on the cross. The leader of the party was Praxeas, who came, in the second century, from Asia Minor, the birthplace of Monarchianism, as an antagonist of Montanism. He went to Rome, and induced the Roman Bishop (either Eleutherius or Victor) to excommunicate the Montanists of Asia Minor. He next went to Carthage, where he was opposed by Tertullian, who wrote a treatise against him. The doctrine of Praxeas was one of those infinite shades of distinction which spring from the contests in the early Church on that paramount doctrine of Christianity—the nature of Christ and His relation to the primal and paternal Godhead.

Patronage.—The right to present a clergyman to a living; i.e. to nominate him to the bishop for the purpose of institution. This right was originally confined to the bishop of the diocese; but in the Council of Orange [A.D. 441] it was enacted that one who built a church might be allowed the presentation to it, and by a law of Justinian [A.D. 541] it was laid down that the founders of churches and their heirs should enjoy the privilege of nominating the incumbents; provided always [1] that a sufficient maintenance were provided for the clerk, [2] that the bishop approved of the nominee. The system soon became general throughout the West. It was introduced into England by Archbishop Theodore [A.D. 668-90]. Abuses, as was natural, gradually crept in. Churches were sometimes built as a profitable speculation, the builder taking the offerings and allowing to the incumbent a fixed income, while he appropriated the surplus to his own use. Occasionally the right of presentation was divided among several heirs, which led to a division of the living into a like number of parts, each held by a separate clerk. Frequently the patron claimed the right of introducing or ejecting a priest without any reference to the bishop; whilst, on the other hand, the bishop sometimes unreasonably refused to institute the patron's nominee. Against such practices, frequent canons and laws were directed; bishops were prohibited from consecrating churches built for profit; the partition of livings was put a stop to; the bishop's consent was made a condition of induction; and bishops were forbidden to withhold their consent except for valid reasons.

Instead of being regarded merely as a trust, patronage came to be considered as a vested right, and therefore as saleable property, which might be sold either with the estate or as a separate property. In England, the perpetual right of presentation is called an "advowson;" if appended to an estate, it is an "advowson appendant;" if a property by

He returned in 770, in Italy, where he had been exiled, and devoted the rest of his life to writing. He continued his Historia Lombardorum down to the year 774, and wrote for his son the Historia of Rome, called Metropolis. He wrote De Gestis and several other works, of which, on John the Baptist, the notes in the musical score by Guido of Arezzo.

She founded there a school, and hospital, and died in 1000. She is commemorated by the Church on Jan. 26th.

A heretical sect which arose in the middle of the seventh century from whom they derived their name (from one Paul of Samosata); from a Paul of prominent member of the sect of the eighth century; or from himself, whose teaching was intended to follow. There was a controversy as to their doctrine, that they were reformed and Scriptural in denouncing them as heresies, however, as in Sicily and Phutius, are. They believed in two worlds, the present world, the other, the world to come.

New Testament only, authority to the Epistles and Gospels of St. Luke and the Sacraments, and images and the growing of the Virgin Mary. They were able to attend catholic councils and their true views by their writings.

the sect appears to have been founded by Constantine, a man of letters who lived about the year 653 at Mananalis, a village near Samosata. It happened that a copy of the Gospels and Pauline Epistles came into his possession, which he diligently studied. His reading led him to renounce some of the errors of his hereditary belief, but did not prevent him from substituting others, and he produced a system which, though professedly in accordance with the New Testament, was really founded on a Manichean basis. The new doctrines soon gained converts. Constantine settled at Kibossa, in Armenia, and assumed the name of Silvanus. Here he remained for twenty-seven years, until the year 684, when the Emperor, having heard of the progress of the sect, made an attack upon it. The Emperor's officer, Symeon, captured Constantine and a number of his followers, and ranging the latter in a line, ordered them to stone their leader. All but one refused, but by the hand of that one—his adopted son, Justus—the heresiarch fell. The officer, Symeon, however, struck with their constancy, began to inquire into the Paulician doctrines, with the result that he was converted, and succeeded Constantine as leader of the sect, under the name of Titus. About A.D. 690 the youth Justus became uneasy as to the truth of his religion, and, failing to obtain satisfaction from Symeon, applied to the Bishop of a neighbouring town. The Bishop informed the Emperor, Justinian II., of the tenets of the sect, and the latter exerted himself for its suppression. Justus, Symeon, and many others were burnt, and the remainder dispersed. But Paulicianism was not stamped out. A new leader arose in the person of the Armenian Paul, under whom it soon recovered its strength. But after his death, the sect grew corrupt, and sank lower and lower till about A.D. 801. It was then reformed by the exertions of Sergius, who had lately been converted to Paulicianism, and promoted to the headship under the name of Tychicus.

The disposition of the Emperors towards the sect had varied. Leo the Isaurian and Constantine Copronymus transported many of them to Thrace; Nicephorus granted them toleration; Michael Caropolates and Leo the Armenian fiercely persecuted them. The Empress Theodora [A.D. 844] undertook the suppression of the sect, and under her not less than a hundred thousand were killed in various ways. Amongst these was the father of Carbeas, a captain of the guard. Carbeas was so enraged at his father's death, that he deserted with 5,000 followers to the Saracens, by whom he was given the city of Tephrica and other places. Here he was joined by other Paulicians, and they soon became strong enough to menace the Empire. With the help of the Saracens, Carbeas defeated Michael; the son of the Empress, at Samosata, and this success was followed up by his son-in-law, Chrysochares, who was able to force the Emperor Basil to beg for peace [A.D. 867]. But a few years after [A.D. 871] Chrysocheres was defeated and slain by one of Basil's generals, Tephrica was taken and destroyed, and the power of the sect overthrown. Paulicianism, however, was kept alive by those who had been settled in Thrace. From this centre it spread over Europe, and is heard of as late as the eleventh century.

Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, born at Bordemur about 353, of noble parents, from whom he inherited great wealth. He spent his youth in careless enjoyment, was educated by Ausonius, and became Consul of Rome in 379. After his consulship he travelled, and made the acquaintance of St. Martin of Tours, St. Ambrose, and others, under whose influence he first turned his thoughts to religion, and was baptised by Delphinus, Bishop of Bordeaux, in 391. Having determined to devote himself to a religious life, he separated from his wife Thermana, sold his estate and divided his wealth among the poor, and was ordained presbyter at Barcelona in 393. He went to Nola in 394, and in 409, having made himself esteemed and venerated for his piety and asceticism, he was chosen bishop of that place. He died June 22nd, 431. Paulinus left a number of letters which are valuable for the descriptions of social life and the architecture of the time, and some of his poems have also been preserved.

Paulinus, Sr.—Paulinus, the first Archbishop of York, was sent to England by Gregory the Great, together with Mellitus and Justus, to help St. Augustine in converting the people of Kent to Christianity. He had laboured there for over twenty years, when Edwin, King of Northumbria, asked in marriage Ethelburga, daughter of Ethelbert. It was thought dangerous to send her away from home to a country where she would be surrounded by heathens on all sides without having some one by her side to protect her. It was, therefore, decided that Paulinus should accompany her, and he immediately devoted himself to the conversion of those among whom he lived. Before leaving the south he was consecrated Bishop by Justus, who was then Archbishop of Canterbury. He used all the arguments he could to persuade Edwin to become a Christian, but at first without any success. But at the beginning of the year 629 the King called together a meeting of the Witenagemote that all might freely discuss the strange doctrines preached by Paulinus. The result was that Edwin was baptised at York on Easter Day of the same year, and the heathen high priest was by far the most zealous of that assembly in pulling down the temples and images of the idols. From that time Paulinus was most successful in his efforts among the people of the north, and established the Church there on a very firm basis. About the year 630, Pope Honorius sent him a pallium, and constituted the Bishop metropolitan of the north. Lived in battle in 633, and his widow set up a nunnery on the sea-coast of Kent would not be separated from her, & the See of York, and soon after, when fell vacant, was appointed Bishop of the diocese. He died in 644.

Paulists.—A name given to a congregation of the Missionary Order "Paul the Apostle," founded at New York in 1858 by Isaac Thomas Hecker. The members of the order had taken the fourfold vows in order to carry on work in America. The head of the Order is the Superior-General, but the rule is a general council of members, elected together by voluntary agreement.

Paulus, HEINRICH EBERHARD (b. 1761, d. 1831).—An eminent theologian of Germany. He was born at Leonberg, near Stuttgart, studied at Tübingen where he graduated in 1784. By the aid of the Baron de Palm, he travelled into France and Saxony to examine into his education, and then went to Göttingen to study Oriental languages, which afterwards continued in London and Paris. In 1789 he was made Professor of Languages in the University of Jena, where he occupied himself in explaining the New Testament in a philosophical manner, which he published as A Key to the Psalms [1791], and A Key to Isaiah [1793], and his Old Testament Historical Commentary on the Five Books of Moses [1800-4]. In 1793 he had been made Professor of Theology, but in 1803 he was obliged him to leave Jena, and he took the Chair of Theology at Würzburg, where the Chair was abolished, he led a wandering life, going in 1808 to Bamberg, the following year to Nurnberg, and in 1811 to Aachen. In the same year he was called to the Chair of Theology and Ecclesiastical History at Halle, where he remained till his death. He started a political and historical journal called Sophronismos, in which he wrote on passing events of importance. He was a most voluminous writer, and his works exercised a wider influence on German opinion in Germany. He was a purely rationalist: his criticism of the Bible shows a profound conviction that nothing supernatural in it was either to be accounted for by natural causes, or that the only true criticism was to prove this. He acknowledged the existence of Christ's moral character, but his miracles he said only appeared to be because all the circumstances attending them had not been handed down to us. His rationalistic views did not change, they remained as they were in 1831.

see them far outstripped by the theory of Strauss. Amongst his works we may mention his Reminiscences [1792-1803], Life of Jesus as a History of Early Christianity, Commentary on the Three First Gospels, and Sketches of the History of my Working Back for Fifty Years [1839]. In retired from his post with a pension.

—A metal plate, engraved with a given to the people to kiss at the end of Mass. Owing to the confusion by the "kiss of peace," the Pax was used about the thirteenth century in the mutual salutation.

Pax ["Peace be with you"].—The salutation of the minister to the people, the latter answering, "And with thy peace." The use of the mutual salutation in primitive times, and is referred to by Chrysostom and St. Augustine. It is [1] by the bishop on entering the church; [2] by the reader on commencing Mass; [3] by the preacher before and after sermon; [4] by the celebrant before giving the elements; [5] by the deacon blessing the congregation. The third Council of Carthage forbade its use by the laity and restricted it to the clergy proper. In the Anglican Church the salutation has the form of "The Lord be with you."

Pearce, ZACHARY [b. in London, 1690; d. Ealing, 1774], was educated at Westminster School, and thence went to Cambridge where he distinguished himself as a scholar. He took orders in 1716, and became Chaplain to Lord Chief Justice Parker, whose interest he was preferred successively to the livings of Stapleford Abbot's, St. Bartholomew's, London, and St. Martin-in-the-Fields. In 1739 Pearce became Dean of Winchester; in 1748, Bishop of Ely, and in 1756, Bishop of Rochester and London, Westminister. He resigned the latter in order to devote more time to work. His publications were numerous, and included a commentary, with notes, on the four Evangelists and the Acts of the Apostles, together with a new translation of St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, published in 1777; an edition of Cicero, Seneca, and of Longinus; a review of the Paradise Lost, and The Miracles of Jesus, &c. He is buried in Bromley Church, and was a great benefactor to the poor established there for the widows of the army. The inscription on his grave, written by himself, is characteristic of the calm self-possession of his life. It states that "he, who in the Deanery of Westminster, and the comfortable hope of (what had been the object in life) being promoted to a higher sphere hereafter." Dean Stanley remarks that he would have been persuaded into the removal of some of the most interesting tombs in Westminster Abbey, had it not been for the strong remonstrances of Horace Walpole.

Pearson, JOHN [b. at Snoring, in Norfolk, Feb. 12th, 1612; d. at Chester, July 16th, 1686].—One of the most important theologians of the English Church. After being educated at Eton he was admitted to King's College, Cambridge, of which he was made a Fellow, and became Prebendary of Sarum in 1639, and Chaplain to Lord-Keeper Finch in the following year. His reputation for learning and eloquence was so great that he received successively appointments as Incumbent of Torrington; Preacher at St. Clement's, Eastcheap; Rector of St. Christopher's, in London; Prebendary of Ely; Archdeacon of Surrey; Master of Jesus College, Cambridge; and, finally, Bishop of Chester, in 1672. Burnet declared that Pearson was the greatest divine of his age, and Dr. Bentley said of him, that his "very dross is gold." His chief work is his Exposition of the Creed, remarkable for the orthodoxy and moderation of its doctrines; the substance of it was first delivered as a series of lectures in St. Clement's, Eastcheap. It is still a standard work of English theology. He also wrote Vindiciæ Epistolarum S. Ignatii, which was long considered as the best work on the Ignatian epistles; Annales Paulini, and other minor theological works. He was present at the Savoy Conference, and assisted in the final revision of the Prayer Book.

Peckham, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Edward I. Educated at Oxford and Paris, he travelled to Rome, where he was appointed by the Pope to the post of Auditor of the Rota, which office he held till his promotion to the See of Canterbury, effected by the authority of the Pope. Here he set himself to reform abuses, and attempted to restore primitive discipline. Dr. Jessop gives some interesting proofs of his zeal in the account of his Visitation of the Diocese of Norwich. He died in 1291.

Peculiar People.—A sect, chiefly found in Kent, who have created much stir of late years by refusing to use medicine, or to adopt any natural means for recovery from sickness, placing their dependence entirely on prayer. Not long since, in consequence of a death which, according to medical evidence, might have been prevented by treatment, the persons responsible, who defended themselves on the ground here described, were convicted of manslaughter.

Peculiars.—Churches exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary of the diocese. They are:—[1] royal peculiars, e.g. the sovereign's free chapels, under the jurisdiction of the sovereign; [2] archbishop's, bishop's, dean's, chapter's peculiars, etc.; and, formerly, [3] peculiars of monasteries.

Pederecti ["feet erect"].—A name of the Eunomians, an Arian sect, followers of Eunomius, a disciple of Arius. Their baptismal rites were remarkable. They baptised by dipping the body as far as the breast, with the head downwards and feet erect. Hence their name.

Pelagianism.—Towards the close of the fourth century the heresy of Pelagianism took its rise in the Church of Britain. Pelagius [b. about 380, d. about 450]—the classic form of his British name of Morgan—was a priest of some learning, much of whose later life was spent at Rome, until that city was taken by Alaric and his Goths, when he went to Carthage for a time, and thence to Jerusalem. The substance of his heresy was the denial of original sin. He believed and taught that none but Adam himself received any damage from his sin; that we are born as holy as Adam was before his fall; and that we can live a holy life by the mere power of our own determination to do so, without the aid of supernatural grace from God. The great ST. AUGUSTINE [not the English missionary, but the still greater Bishop of Hippo, a town in that part of Africa which is now called Algeria] was the chief opponent of this heresy, which seems only to have reached Britain—though invented by a native of the country—after it had been known for some years in Palestine and Africa. When it did arrive, the orthodox party in the British Church applied to the Church of France—not to the Church of Rome—for some persons of learning and discretion who might come across the Channel and assist in combating the heresy. Germanus and Lupus, Bishops of Auxerre and Troyes, were sent over for the purpose; and a conference was held between them and the Pelagians at St. Albans, in the presence of a great multitude. ST. GERMAN, by his arguments in the conference, and by the fervid eloquence of his preaching, afterwards brought the greater part of his hearers back to the orthodox side.

Pelagius, POPES.—There have been two Popes of this name. The first [555–560] was seriously compromised by taking part in the Monophysite controversy, and supporting the Empress Theodora in her defence of it. He had been the main advisor of his predecessor Vigilius, but on being appointed his successor endeavoured to rid himself of the charge of heresy. But his success was very partial. [See Milman's Lat. Christ., i. 324.]

The second lived in the miserable days of the Lombard invasion. He endeavoured to reconcile the Monophysite strifes, but little heed was paid to him. He was succeeded by Gregory the Great.

Pelliccia, ALEXIUS AURELIUS [b. 1744], was a native of Naples, and appears to have spent all his life there. For many years he was Public Teacher of Ethics and Archæology in the university, and also Professor in that congregation of which was called the "Conferenza in the discharge of his duties the handy compendium of his subjects, on writing one for the young who sat under him, and wrote the Christian Church—one of the plote, comprehensive, and candid produced upon ecclesiastical arch is more comprehensive than because the latter only deals w times, whereas Pelliccia devoted h gigantic task of giving the polity of the ancient, mediæval, Church up to the date of publ 1777. His work is divided into treating of the Government and the Church, of Holy Places, of O Benedictions, of the Kalendar Days, of the Judicial Functions of and of the Offices for Marriages a Not the least value of this writer spicuous fairness. His sympathi the whole Catholic Church, with and Anglican as with the Roman seldom claims for any distinctly a greater antiquity than histor the book has long been rega authority by German scholars of and has recently been translated by the Rev. Penance.—In the primitive who fell into sin after baptism we to rigid discipline. Before they c absolution—contrition, confession faction were necessary. To this e were divided into four classes. T the "mourners" [flentes], whose st the church porch, where they prost selves before the faithful as the begging their prayers on their beh admitted into the second class termed the "hearers" [audientes], a mitted to enter the church an lessons and the sermon, but not to prayers of the church. They were then called the [genuflectentes], or "prostrators" [sm their place in church was in the the ambon or reading-desk. Not till they had been from this fourth stage were they a partake of the Holy Eucharist. for passing through the different penitents varied in accordance Penitentiary Priests were early established in some of the Churches of the East for the purpose of hearing the confessions of the lapsed and giving them instruction. The office was abolished by Nectorius of Constantinople in A.D. 391. Though not established in the Western Church in early times, it was introduced in the twelfth century, and a canon of the Lateran Council, A.D. 1215, enjoins the appointment of a penitentiary in every diocese.

Penitents. [PENANCE.]

Penitents, ORDERS OF.—A name applied to certain fraternities in Italy and elsewhere who profess to do public penance at certain times in the year, and are distinguished from other religious brotherhoods by the shape and colour of their dress. The White Penitents, the most ancient order of this class, were instituted about 1260 by a friar of Perugia, who proclaimed that the wrath of God was about to fall upon the city, and could only be appeased by a general repentance. His auditors clothed themselves in sackcloth and went round the city in procession, chastising themselves with whips to expiate their sins. The Order of Black Penitents was instituted in 1488 by some Florentines for the purpose of tending criminals during imprisonment and before their death, and giving them decent burial, and also of burying all who were found dead in the streets. There are other orders of penitents distinguished by different colours, though in rules they follow one or other of the orders already mentioned.

The name has also been given to orders established for penitent women, as:—

Penitents of St. Magdalen.—An order established in 1272 by Bernard, a citizen of Marseilles. [See PENITENTIARIES.]

Penitents of St. Magdalen, Congregation of, at Paris, owed its origin to the preaching of a Franciscan, about 1492. Charles VIII. gave a palace for the use of this order, but it was removed to St. George's Chapel in 1572. It was originally established for the purpose of rescuing the fallen, but afterwards became simply a nunnery.

Penitents of the Name of Jesus.—A congregation of women at Seville, founded in 1550. It is divided into three parts—one for nuns, another for novices, and a third for those who are under correction.

Penitents of Orvieto.—An order of nuns instituted by Antonio Simoncelli, and erected in 1662 into a monastery for the reception of those who had led a sinful life, and wished to devote themselves to the service of God.

Penn, WILLIAM [b. in London, Oct. 14th, 1644; d. at Ruscombe, Berkshire, July 30th, 1718], son of Sir William Penn, the Admiral; a celebrated Quaker. He went to Christ Church, Oxford, and was there converted to Quakerism by the preaching of Thomas Loe, which took such a hold upon his mind that he and some fellow-students were accustomed to hold prayer-meetings together, and attempted to prevent the wearing of surplices in the University by tearing them away from the students. For this they were expelled, and Penn was sent by his father, in 1662, to France, and studied at Paris and Saumur, whence he proceeded to Turin for a short time. He returned to England in 1664, and became a student at Lincoln's Inn; but was despatched to Ireland two years later to manage his father's estates in the county of Cork. His Quakerish tendencies were here strongly developed, and he quarrelled with his father because the latter desired him to take off his hat in the presence of royalty, which Penn persistently refused to do. In 1668 he published The Sandy Foundation Shaken, in which he attacked the doctrine of the Trinity as usually received, and of the mediation of Christ, and for which he was imprisoned in the Tower. He was released through the intervention of the Duke of York; but was again arrested in 1670 for breach of the Conventicle Act, and sent to Newgate for six months. His father had died leaving him a large annuity, with which he visited Holland and Germany in the cause of Quakerism, and afterwards obtained a grant from the Crown of land in America on which to found a Quaker settlement. He and his friends started in August, 1682, and the colony of Pennsylvania, on the Delaware, was founded, of which they immediately set to work to build the capital, Philadelphia. The form of government, which had been framed in England, was accepted by the freemen of the province, and a bond of friendship established with the natives, which was in no way broken for more than seventy years. The colony seemed in a fair way of prosperity, and during the two years after it was established about fifty ships arrived, bringing English, Dutch, and German emigrants. Penn returned to England in 1684, and after the death of Charles II., became very intimate with James II., insomuch that he was suspected of Romish tendencies, and on several occasions arrested; after the Revolution he was accused of complicity in a plot to restore the late King, and forced to live in retirement. He made a second expedition to Pennsylvania with the intention of changing the proprietary governments to regal ones, but abandoned the design and returned to England, much encumbered with debt; he spent his last years at Ruscombe.

Pennaforte, RAYMOND DE, Chaplain to Gregory IX., was born at Barcelona at the end of the twelfth century, being descended from the kings of Arragon. He studied at Barcelona and Bologna, and entered the Order, of which, in 1238, he was created; but resigned the office afterwards to become a missionary to the Jews. He became Confessor to Henry III. in 1230, at whose orders he wrote the sixth collection of Decretals, wrote Summa Canonum Penitentiarum, printed at Rome in 1603. He died in 1276, and was canonised by Pope Gregory X. in 1276.

Author, Rev. W. [MILDMAY.]

Author, John [A. at Cefnbrith, in Brecknockshire, Wales, in 1559].—He was educated at Cambridge, but during the years spent at Cambridge, and subsequently he adopted Puritan views, and took the degree of M.A. At Oxford he was respected, but got himself into trouble with the authorities in consequence of the somewhat extreme nature of his opinions, and the persecution was increased by a plea which was made for the preaching of the Gospel. In 1588 he published various tracts, and in the same year appeared the first edition of his "Martin Marprelate." THE CONTROVERSY.] The author was supposed to be Penry himself, but it is now known that he was only the publisher, and the author was Henry Barlowe; but so much suspicion attached to him that, in 1589, he fled to Scotland, and did not return for England until 1593. Meanwhile he had become a Quaker, and as this caused him to be regarded as dangerous to the Church, he was again imprisoned in March, 1593. He was released on a charge of treason, and though there was no evidence forthcoming to prove that he was the author of the "Martin Marprelate," passages in his diary were so interpreted as to look like proofs, and he was again imprisoned at St. Thomas-a-Watering, London, in 1593.

Cost.—Among ancient Christians the term signifies sometimes the whole week between the Easter and the Whitsun festival, and sometimes the latter festival itself. The whole period of fifty days, being a time of honour and memory of the Saviour's resurrection, was a time of more than ordinary devotion, and it was a custom of very ancient date to worship standing, in kneeling, during the whole of this period, to mark its joyful character. At a later date the Fast of the Rogation Days was introduced, modifying the ancient custom in the direction of excluding fasting from this Whitsuntide.]

Costals.—Oblations made to a saint at Whitsuntide, by the inhabitants of the district.

Abulation of Parishes, or the Bounds, is a custom, still existing in some parts of England, of making a progress round the boundary of the parish during Rogation week. [ROGATION.]

The practice is derived from the annual processions at this season, originated by Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne [A.D. 460], for the purpose of imploring God's blessing on the freshly-sown seed. At the Reformation all religious processions were abolished except those, an injunction of Queen Elizabeth providing "that the parishioners shall, once in a year, at the time accustomed, with the curate and the substantial men of the parish, walke about the parishes, as they were accustomed, and at their return to the church make their common prayers." No service was, however, appointed, but it was enjoined that "the curate . . . at certain convenient places, shall admonish the people to give thanks to God, in the beholding of God's benefits, for the increase and abundance of his fruits upon the face of the earth, with the saying of Psalm civ, Benedic omnes gentes. At which time also the same minister shall inculcate this and such like sentences:—Cursed be he that translateth the bounds and doles of his neighbour, or such other order of prayer as shall be hereafter appointed."

Perfect.—A term applied in the early Church to those who had received full instruction in the Christian religion, and were admitted to a participation in the Holy Eucharist. Converts were called "imperfect"; catechumens of some standing became "more perfect"; and at the end of their probation were admitted into the number of the "perfect."

Perfecti or Boni Homines.—This was a name given to several monastic orders, both in England and on the Continent. Thus an order founded in the eleventh century, at Vincennes, transferred in 1584 to the Minims; several Portuguese houses who sent missionaries to India and Asia Minor, and an English order of the thirteenth century, all bore this name. In the thirteenth century the stricter Catharists assumed the name of Perfecti. They held the Manichean doctrines, and resembled the PARACLETES [q.v.]. A Council was held at Lombes, in southern France, in 1165, to condemn the Perfecti.

Perfectionists.—Those who believe that it is possible to attain to actual perfection in this life. There are four classes of Perfectionists:—[1] The Roman Catholics, who teach that a man may, by obedience, become free from all mortal sin, though still subject to fall into venial sin; and even this tendency may be done away through the special favour of God. [2] The Wesleyan Arminians, who teach Christian perfection, namely, the fulfilment of the Law by faith and love, through the grace of God, though the infirmity of the body prevents it from being absolute in the eyes of men. [3] Many Quakers, who say that in souls justified by God "the body of death and sin comes to be crucified and removed, and their hearts united and subjected unto the truth, so as not to obey any suggestion or temptation of the Evil One, but to be free from actual sinning and transgressing of the law of God, and in that respect perfect." Yet this theory does not preclude the possibility of attaining to a higher degree of perfection, nor of falling away from a state of grace. [4] The Oberlin school of theology, who say that perfection is to be reached by a life of implicit obedience, which effectually prevents the possibility of sin, since virtue and sin cannot exist in the same soul at the same time. The Calvinists and Lutherans absolutely reject the theory of Perfectionism.

The name "Perfectionist" has also been given to a modern sect established in North America by John Humphrey Noyes, in 1845. Noyes was an independent preacher in New Haven, who gave out that he discovered from St. Paul's Epistles that all Christian religions were wrong, so started a new Church. There are now three settlements of this sect, the largest at Oneida Creek, where he first preached, and two smaller ones at Brooklyn and Wallingford. The views of this sect are, that all men are wholly good or wholly evil, and that all actions are wholly righteous or wholly wicked. They hold that they themselves are sinless, and are reconciled to God, that man and woman are entirely equal, and that all goods are common. As they are "perfect," and can commit no sin, no positive religion is needful for them, and their church has been described as "a chapel, a theatre, a concert-room, a casino, a working-place, all in one, being supplied with benches, lounging chairs, work-tables, a reading desk, a stage, a gallery, and a pianoforte." The system of "free love," or "complex marriages," has been established, which has led to an abolition of monogamy and the marriage bond. The sect is also known as the "Bible Communists" and "Free Lovers," and is in many points similar to the PRINCEITES [q.v.].

Pericopæ.—Portions of the New Testament appointed to be read in the ancient Christian Church on Sundays and festivals. Some say that the selection was made as early as Apostolic times, while others fix the time as the fourth century, and some even as late as the eighth century. The custom corresponds with the Jewish Parashas and Haphtarahs. The Parashas were fifty-four sections, into which the Law was divided, so that the whole of it should be read during the year. Fifty-four was the greatest number of Sabbaths possible in a year, and when there were a smaller number two portions were read together. The Haphtarahs were fifty-four sections chosen from the Prophets, and read in like manner. This is still continued amongst the modern Jews, but the portions of the Prophets now read generally omit the prophecies regarding the Messiah.

The method of selection of the lessons in the Church of England will be found under the head LECTIONARY [q.v.].

In the Roman missal each mass has two Scripture lessons, which are mostly taken from the Vulgate Version.

The Greek Church has special Epistles and Gospels for every week-day as well as every Sunday and Saint's Day.

In the Armenian Church, Scripture reading takes a very important place; from Easter to Pentecost they have three services a day, and portions from the Old and New Testament specially selected for each service.

Peristerion.—A dove of gold or silver, suspended over the altar or in the baptistery, of some ancient churches. Later a custom arose of keeping the reserved sacrament in these doves.

Perjury.—The taking an oath in order to tell or confirm a falsehood. This was considered a very heinous crime, both by the heathens and Jews, and among Christians is to be looked upon with great abhorrence, as it is treating God with irreverence, denying, or, at least, ignoring His omniscience, profaning His name, and violating truth.

Perpetua, St.—One of five catechumens who were seized at Carthage in the third century during the persecution of Severus. She had three young men (Revocatus, Severinus, and Secundulus) and one woman (Felicitas) as fellow-sufferers. She was offered liberty if she would give up her faith, and to refuse was doubly hard in that she was the mother of an infant whom she would be obliged to leave to the mercy of her enemies. Her mother was a Christian, her father still a heathen, and he used to come to the prison day after day to urge her to recant. While they were in prison, the priest was, at first, allowed to come and see them, and took the opportunity of baptising them there. A few days after Perpetua was thrown into a dark dungeon, but was allowed to have her baby with her, which she declared turned the dungeon into a palace. When her father heard that the trial was coming on, he made one more attempt to persuade her to save her life, but to no purpose, and sentence of death was pronounced. Her child had been taken to her father's house, and the day before her death she sent a message that she wished to see it once more, but he would not grant her request. The authorities had decided that the five prisoners should be torn to pieces on an approaching festival. It was the custom in Carthage at that time to dress their victims, the men as priests of Saturn, the women as priestesses of Ceres, before they were thrown to the wild beasts. But these five protested so earnestly against such an insult that the officers yielded, and having been tossed by a bull several led into the centre of the arena, despatched by the sword of a she herself guiding his aim. A her memory has been kept since Gregory the Great on Mar. 7th. of St. Perpetua," said to have been the most part by herself, are still utions.—The causes of persecu- ligious history are manifold and l. The Lord Jesus Christ was by the Pharisees because He exposed their hypocrisy, and by the Jews in general because He ran counter to their pre- judices. These causes produced a like treat- ment of His Apostles; and the ignorance of the heathens was another cause of persecu- tion: the Christians were confounded by them with the rebellious Jews, and indiscri- minately persecuted. Thus the historian Suetonius says that Christ excited the Jews to frequent tumults. Furthermore, Gentile superstition came to the increase of persecu- tion: the heathens could not endure a sect which aimed at the destruction of the worship of their gods. The Jews frequently escaped rough treatment simply because, though they practised their own rites, they let those of the heathens alone. But this was exactly what the Christians would not do. They boldly called on men "to turn from their vanities and serve the true God alone." Thus it was that they were called "Atheists," as enemies of the gods. And so all calumnies among them were believed by the superstitious: they burned Rome, made nightly conspiracies, ate human flesh, worshipped an ass's head, com- mitted adultery, incest, infanticide. The base heresies of the Nicolaitanes, Carpocra- tians, and others, sometimes gave colour to the slanders. But another cause, which influ- enced some of the best and wisest of the Emperors, was found in political ideas. The Gentile religion was interwoven with the State; and men like Trajan, who conscien- tiously believed it their duty to uphold exist- ing institutions, regarded Christianity as a hostile, and therefore a dangerous, principle. Its professors were denounced as the enemies of kings, of laws, and of the human race.

The persecutions in the New Testament were [1] about Stephen, [2] by Herod Agrippa (Acts xii.), [3] those stirred up by the Jews against St. Paul, [4] those raised by heathens who saw that their gains were endangered (Acts xvi. and xx.).

In Ecclesiastical History there are com- monly reckoned ten persecutions. They are the following; notices of each will be found under their several names:—

The accession of Constantine the Great, the first Christian Emperor, put an end to the persecutions of Christianity by the Empire. Would that no more needed to be added to this article. But Christian history has to record that persecution has been used as a weapon age after age for enforcing obedience to that form of religion which is strongest. The Arian controversy, which began the reign of Constantine, was the signal for persecution, now by the Arians, now by their opponents. "Toleration," it has been well said, "was the last Christian virtue to be learned." It was argued that as error of opinion leads to disorganization of society, to moral evils, and (in early opinion) to everlasting perdition, such error must be put down like any other offence against the well being of the commonwealth. The barbarous nations who broke into the Roman Empire and destroyed it were frequently persecutors. Thus the Vandals, both in their heathen days, and also after they had embraced the Arian faith, desolated the Church, and persecuted those who remained faithful to the ancient creed to death. The English, on arriving as heathens in this country, persecuted the Christian Britons, destroyed their churches, and drove them into the mountains. The cruelties of the Mahometans when they began their career of conquest were terrible and remorseless. "The Koran or the sword" was their sole alternative to all who fell into their power. During the Middle Ages all movements in the direction of freethought were regarded by the dominant religion as warfare against the Kingdom of God. The persecutions of the Waldenses and Albigenses, and the establishment of the Inquisition, are described in their places, as are also the Hussite wars, the persecutions of the Lollards, and the fires of Smithfield in the reign of Queen Mary. On the accession of Elizabeth the tables were turned, and the spirit of persecution was directed against the Roman Catholics, who were proceeded against as traitors to the State, and fined and imprisoned for not attending the established worship. Cases also occurred occasionally of the infliction of death for heresy, a penalty inflicted by Elizabeth upon both Baptists and Independents [q.v.]. There were those who left England for America in order to secure "freedom to worship God," but even these in turn became persecutors both of those who preferred Episcopacy to Independency, and also of the Quakers. The same spirit showed itself on both sides in England in the days of the Commonwealth and of the Stuarts, and the history of the Scottish Covenanters is a touching narrative of persecutions bravely endured. The Act of Toleration may be said to have put an end to persecution as a legalised instrument in England, but the spirit will hardly be eliminated from mankind, except as human nature itself is altered by the influence of the Gospel of Christ.

Perseverance.—Continuance design, state, opinion, or course. The perseverance of the saints is continuance and progression in a state. This doctrine caused a considerable difference between the Arminians and Calvinists in the arguments of the Calvinists in were as follows:—That the perfections of God, His love, faithfulness, wisdom, power, are such that He would not to condemn His people to everlasting destruction. That since Christ has united Himself and died for them, and lives in intercession for them, their fall would make His work vain, and is a derogatory to the Divine glory. This is upheld, not by his own power, but by the power of the Holy Spirit, which confirms him, and enables him to persevere. In answer to these arguments the Arminians brought forward the doctrine in Scripture against apostasy, and that some would eventually fall from grace, and said that the doctrine precludes all means, and gives encouragement to presumption and false security.

Persia, Religion of.—The religion of Persia, until it fell into the hands of the Arabs in 651, has been described in the PARSIANS [q.v.]. Then the greater part of the population embraced Mohammedanism, but a special branch of it, which is mystical, and is seen under the name of Dravians [q.v.]. Their founder, who was born at the beginning of the last century; there are now thirty or forty sects spread in the surrounding countries. It is a most powerful sect, both in the Ottoman and Persian empires. The Shah is deemed as fully invested with the temporal power till he has received the sword from the successor of Mevlana Jelaleddin, at the present time the Caliphs are within its grasp.

Persia has been the scene of many Nestorian and Roman Catholic missions, but have left little trace behind them. In the middle of the last century a Mohammedan mission which was unsuccessful; and in the last more successful efforts are being made by means of the Church Missionary Society.

Persons or Parsons, James.—An English Jesuit, was born at Nether Stow near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire, 1646. He studied at Oxford, but became a Roman Catholic, went to Rome in 1674, where in the next year he joined the Society of the Jesuits. He came to England with Campion, but the latter was arrested, so 1678, he returned to Rome, though he still endeavored to manage the English mission. He was made the first Rector of the English College at Rome, and in the next year sent to Spain to make preparations for the future mission.

had given them a fair trial; hence, many foolish things came abroad as Pestalozzianism, and hindered the reception of principles and practices which better deserved the name.
His highly active imagination led him to see and describe as actually existing whatever he hoped sooner or later to realise. The enemies of change made the most of his mistakes, and his institution came to a speedy and un-honoured close. When the old man died at the age of eighty, he had seen the apparent failure of all his toils. He had not, however, failed in reality. It has been said of him that his true function was to educate ideas, not children, and when, twenty years later, the centenary of his birth was celebrated by schoolmasters, not only in his native country, but throughout Germany, it was found that Pestalozzian ideas had been sown, and were bearing fruit, over the greater part of Europe."

Pestalozzi himself says, in his Letters on Early Education: "Why have I insisted so strongly on attention to early physical and intellectual education? Because I consider these as merely leading to a higher aim, to qualify the human being for the free and full use of all the faculties implanted by the Creator, and to direct all these faculties towards the perfection of the whole being of man, that he may be enabled to act in his peculiar station as an instrument of that All-wise and Almighty Power that has called him into life."

Pestalozzi adopted the system of teaching from objects, and proceeding from the concrete to the abstract; he introduced graduation in writing, and strove to educate rather than instruct children. He believed in the system of mutual instruction, and set the elder children to teach the younger. His system is much used in the present Kindergarten schools.

Petavius or Petau, DIONYSIUS.—A Roman Catholic theologian [b. at Orleans, 1583; d. at Paris, 1652]; he early became a member of the Order of Jesuits, and lectured on rhetoric at Rheims and La Flèche.
In 1621 he was appointed Professor of Theology at Paris, and became well known as a scholar and critic; he published De Doctrina Temporum, in 1627, a valuable book on chronology. In consideration of this work, Philip IV. invited him to Madrid as Professor of History, and at the same time Pope Urban VIII. invited him to Rome. Petavius declined both offers, and spent the remaining years of his life at the Jesuits' College of Clermont, in Paris, where he wrote his Rationarium Temporum, De Photino Heretico, and De Theologicis Dogmatibus. This last was his most famous work, but he left it unfinished.

Peter, FESTIVALS OF.—There were formerly four festivals of St. Peter kept:—[1]
June 29th, the day on which SS. Peter and Paul are supposed to have been martyred at Rome, the former by crucifixion with his head downwards, the latter by beheading. This is the oldest of the feasts of the Apostles, having been observed since the fourth century. [2] Feb. 22nd, the festival of St. Peter's Chair at Antioch. Though there is no account in the Bible of the foundation of the church at Antioch, it is generally believed to have been the work of St. Peter, who established his episcopal chair first in this place. [3] Jan. 18th, St. Peter's Chair at Rome. Celebrated in honour of St. Peter's fixing his episcopal work there after seven years at Antioch. [4] August 1st, St. Peter's Chains, or St. Peter ad Vincula, the day on which the Roman Catholics honour his chains, and commemorate his miraculous deliverance from the hands of Herod Agrippa. The 1st of August was probably the day on which the church on the Esquiline Hill was dedicated to St. Peter in Chains. It was built by Eudoxia, wife of Valentine III., about the middle of the fifth century.

Peter Lombard. [Lombard.]

Peter Martyr. [Martyr.]

Peter of Lampachus, St.—A Christian martyr who was seized by order of the Emperor Decius in 249, at Lampachus, a city on the Hellespont. The Pro-Consul Optimus tried to persuade him to offer sacrifice to Venus, promising that by so doing he should save his life. Peter refused, and Optimus ordered that he should be broken to pieces on a wheel. It was done slowly, and although he was in the most horrible tortures, the martyr's courage was undaunted. A few days after, three of his companions were brought before Optimus, and the same alternative was offered them—apostasy or death—and they all chose the latter. But one of them, Nicomachus, whilst he was on the rack, cried out that he was ready to sacrifice to the gods. He was immediately released and given full liberty. A few moments after, however, he fell down dead. The other two, Andrew and Paul, were given another chance of saving their lives, but remained firm. The Governor thought that he would be able in time to persuade them to sacrifice as he wished, and was willing to put off sentence of death, but the mob was so fierce against them, and so eager for their blood, that Optimus was afraid to delay. He handed them over to the infuriated populace, by whom they were stoned to death.

Peter the Hermit was born at Amiens in the middle of the eleventh century. He went to Jerusalem in 1093, and, seeing the deplorable condition of the Christians, on his return to Europe preached the first crusade, persuading most of the princes of Europe to join him. He was made the head of the enterprise, and had about 40,000 foot-cavalry, under him: but the people enthusiastic to wait for a regular army, landed in Constantinople in 1096, and thence to Bithynia, where they were and but 3,000 returned to Constantinople. He was present at the siege of Jerusalem in 1099, and was left Vicar-General of the time; but afterwards returned to France, and died in 1115 in the monastery of Neumagen in Liège.

Peterborough, Bismarck co.—was not till the reign of Henry VIII. that the borough had a bishop of its own. It possessed a most important Benedictine abbey, and at the dissolution, the last Abbot, John Chambers, became its first Bishop. The choir hitherto formed part of the great See, and it is said that the abbey was spared when the rest was surrendered, on account of its being the burial place of Catharine of Aragon. The present cathedral is the third which has been erected on the same spot. The first was built in the seventh century (about 666) by Penda, the son of Pea, and died before its completion, this was a monastic establishment of central importance. Its site was the little village of Merton, a hamlet, called afterwards, from the patron of the abbey, Burgh St. Peter. On the completion of the building, it was hallowed with the names of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew by Deusdedit, Archbishop of Canterbury. Other prelates, in the presence of Wulfstan, had succeeded his brother Penda, who was its first abbot. This abbey was destroyed in 870 by the Danes, and rebuilt in the time of the seventh abbot, Hildred, who was killed in the attack with all his monks, said to number upwards of eighty. A century later King Edgar, with Alfwold, bishop of Winchester, as architect, commenced the building of the second church; the structure suffered much from another Danish invasion in the eleventh century, and in 1110 it was accidentally destroyed by fire. Two years after the present structure was commenced, and took in all nearly one hundred years to complete, and was then completed in 1237 by the Bishops of Lincoln. The choir had been ready for service long before, and was built by Abbot Martin de Waterville [1155-1177], the nave by Benedict [1177-1193], who also built the west transept. The original fabric, with additions, but no great alterations, of the consecration much the same as we had not been erected, viz. the tower, the western spire, the new building, the east (often erroneously called the Lady Chapel) built in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries by Abbots Ashton and Kirton, and the tower. With the exception of the Cathedral, Peterborough is the ch left in England. The great building is the west front: the action is not on record, but as it is style of Early English, it was completed not long before the consecration of 1237. There was a chapel dedicated to Thomas-à-Becket, rich in his relics, transferred from Canterbury by Abbot Peter, who was a monk of Christ Church at the time of the murder. On not a few occasions the Sovereign been entertained at a great cost; Stephen, Henry I., and their queens, Edward II., and the Black Prince, were royal visitors. Catharine of Aragon, Queen of Scots, in the south choir, died in 1587, but her remains were re-interred in Westminster in 1613. In what is called the "new building" is preserved a coped stone monument, having six carved figures in monastic dress, supposed to have been erected by Godric, a monk of Evesham, as a memorial of Abbot Peter and his monks. In 1882 the condition of the tower was discovered to be highly defective, and it was found that no expectation of preserving it in its existing state would be of any use, so that it became necessary to rebuild the whole of it. The work of taking down the tower commenced on April 5th, 1883, under the direction of Mr. J. L. Pearson; and it was found that the piers which support the roof must also be rebuilt. In the same year, the remnants of the Saxon minster were met with, the foundations which had formed part of the old minster tower. The "chief corner-stone" was laid on May 7th, 1883, with Masonic honours, by Lord Carnarvon, then Grand Master, in the name of the Prince of Wales as Grand Master, of the Order of the Garter. The work of rebuilding is still in progress.

The revenue of the See is £4,500. There are at present a bishop, a dean, three archdeacons, three minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The diocese comprises the entire counties of Leicester, Northampton, and Rutland, with portions of Lincolnshire, Derbyshire, and Nottinghamshire, and contains 571 benefices.

Peters, Hugh [b. 1599; hanged, 1660]. —An English Nonconformist, who, having preached in Holland and America, returned to England in 1641, joined the Puritan party, and was hanged at the Restoration as a regicide. He wrote in prison A Dying Father's Last Legacy to an Only Child.

Peter's Pence.—The tax paid annually to the See of Rome by England and other countries, and supposed to have been originated either by Offa, King of Mercia, or by Ina of Wessex, for the support of a college in Rome for the education of English clergy. The tax was at first fixed at a penny, to be paid by every family; but was afterwards demanded only from those possessed of a certain fixed income; it was collected upon the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula. Much dissatisfaction was caused by the exaction of payments by the bishops, who were deputed to collect the money, and laws were passed laying a heavy penalty not only on those who refused to pay, but on the bishops in case they should neglect to deliver up the money given into their charge. The custom of collecting Peter's Pence became general in Poland, and was introduced into Prussia and Scandinavia, though the Papal Legates could never succeed in getting it paid regularly; and Gregory VII. tried to exact it from France and Spain, but without success. In England it seems to have been paid more or less regularly till the reign of Henry VIII., but for some time before it had only been regarded as a charity, and was not enforced from the people.

Petrobrusians. — Followers of the heretic Peter of Bruys, who was burnt at St. Gilles about A.D. 1125. The only authorities from which any knowledge of the sect can be gained are a passage in Abelard, and a book by Peter the Venerable, Adversus Petrobrusianos Hæreticos. Peter de Bruys appears to have been an ecclesiastic holding some benefice in the south of France, where he first began to publish his heresy, and gained many followers among the Cathari at Arles and elsewhere; afterwards he preached with great success at Narbonne and Toulouse, but was eventually seized and condemned to death. He professed the desire to restore Christianity to its original purity, and accepted the Gospels, to which he would only grant a literal interpretation; the Epistles he partly rejected, and only granted to them a derivative authority. He would not allow infant baptism; declared that the Church being invisible, no buildings are necessary as places of worship, for the Church exists only in the hearts of the people; denied not only the Real Presence in the Eucharist but also that any sacramental character is attached to it, and regarded it simply as a historical incident in Christ's life. He objected to elaborate ritual of any kind, to prayers for the dead, and to music as a part of Divine Worship; and he abhorred the adoration of the cross, as being the instrument of our Lord's torture. After his death the sect continued to flourish for some time, but finally became merged in that of the Henricians.

Pew, Reading. [DESK.]

Pews, or enclosed seats in church, were not known till after the Reformation, and until the seventeenth century were only used by the patron of the church. The earliest pew for the congregation remaining, whose age is determined by the appearance of a date, is in the north aisle of Geddington St. Mary, Northamptonshire, and bears the date 1602. From this time they became more universal, till the episcopate of Wren, Bishop of Hereford, when they fell into disuse. In his Visitation he says: "Are all the seats and pews so ordered that they which are in them may kneel down in time of prayer, and have their faces up to the holy table? Are there any close pews in your church? Are any pews so loftily made that they do any way hinder the prospect of the church or chancel, so that they which be in them are hidden from the face of the congregation?" With regard to the last point, it has been stated that high pews were first built by the Puritans, so that they might be able unseen to disobey the rubrics, particularly those enforcing bowing at the name of Jesus, and standing at the Gloria Patri.

The following are the laws concerning the holding of pews:—

No person has a legal right to occupy, in the parish church, any pew or seat exclusively without the permission of the churchwardens, except by prescription or by FACULTY [q.v.].

By immemorial use and by reparation [when repairs have been needed] a prescriptive right to a pew may be established as appurtenant to a particular house within the parish; and if a house to which a pew is so legally appurtenant be let, the occupier is entitled to the use of the pew.

But if it can be shown that the pew was not always connected with that particular house, or that it has at any time been repaired by the churchwardens at the cost of the parish, the prescription cannot be established.

A legal claim to a seat or pew, as an inheritance derived from the original holder, or as appurtenant to land, exclusively of a house or residence, cannot be established.

The distribution of pews and seats, which are not held either by faculty or by prescription, rests with the ordinary; the churchwardens are his officers, and they are to allot them to the parishioners according to their reasonable discretion, taking care to afford suitable accommodation to as many as possible. When a parishioner has been placed in a seat or pew by the churchwardens, or has been suffered for some time to occupy it, he is said to have a possessionary right, which he may maintain against a stranger, but he is liable, when occasion shall require, to be displaced by the churchwardens, or, if more church accommodation be required, may make a different distribution of the pews or seats, so as to supply the deficiency; but if they do so capriciously, and without just ground, the ordinary will interfere in these arrangements, therefore, it may be useful that the advice of the minister should be taken; but he has no legal power to restrain.

The erection of a pew or seat by any individual at his own charge, even with the leave of the minister, the churchwardens, and the parishioners, gives him no permanent interest therein: such interest can be held only by a faculty.

Churchwardens must not permit pews or seats to be altered in size, height, &c. etc., at the mere pleasure of individuals.

In a parish church a pew or seat cannot legally be let or sold by any person unless by Act of Parliament: and if a pew or seat be appurtenant to a house, it can only pass with the house to which it is appurtenant. As a general rule, a person not being an occupying landowner in the parish cannot retain to his own use, or acquire a right to a seat in the body of the church, or in the public aisles or galleries.

Philadelphian Society [Gr. philadelphos, "brotherly love"].—A sect founded in 1696 by an aged Englishman named Jane Lead. She embraced, it is said, the same views as Madame Montan. [BORNHOVENIST.] She was a member of good family, from Norfolk, and had devoted a great deal of time to the study of the works of Jacob Boehmen. [BOEHMEN, JACOB.] She wrote many books of a mystical character; one of them is called The Fables of God's Creation manifested in the Fables of Eight Worlds, as they were made known experimentally to the Author. She was of opinion that all dissensions among Christians would cease, and the Kingdom of the Redeemer become, even here below, a glorious scene of charity, concord, and happiness, if those who bear the name of Jesus, without regarding the forms of doctrine or discipline that distinguish particular communities, would all join in committing their souls to the care of the internal guide, to be instructed, governed, and formed by His divine impulses and suggestions. She declared that this desirable event would come to pass, and that she had a Divine commission to proclaim the approach of this glorious consummation of saints, who were to be gathered in one visible universal Church or Kingdom before the dissolution of the earth. Thus she stated that her Philadelphian Society was the true Kingdom of Christ, in which alone the Divine Spirit resided and reigned. She died in 1742.

of 81. She was greatly assisted in her society by Dr. Pordage, one of the reformers, who had afterwards taken to himself a wife and who was a great spirit-seer. The Anabaptists helped to spread the doctrine of mystical piety shown in the WILLIAM LAW [q.v.].

LANDGRAVE OF HESSE, called "the Peaceful" [b. at Marburg, Nov. 1527; d. 1567]. His father, William, died in 1527 and he was declared of age in 1528. In 1521 he attended the Diet of Speyer and though he had not yet pronounced himself of any particular religion, he declared the expediency of giving Luther a hearing, and treated him with kindness. In 1525 he declared himself on the side of the Reformers, and took part in the League against the Roman Catholics. He carried out the project of bringing about an union between the Protestants of Germany and Switzerland, and with this view he convened the Marburg Conference in 1529, to effect, if possible, a reconciliation between Luther and Zwingli. His plans failed, and he was rejected by the Lutherans of sympathy with the Zwinglians. He left Marburg in 1530, and succeeded in forming the Schmalkalden League. His work prospered, and he was regarded as if he might be able to carry out the Reformation greatly by his indomitable and unwearying energy; but this was almost forfeited by a marriage with Catherine von der Saal while his wife was living, to which, however, his wife and the Reformers gave their consent. It was kept a profound secret for some time, but when made public the Landgrave's authority was lost, and in the Schmalkalden war [1546-7] he was captured by the Emperor Charles V. for treason, and through the treachery of his son-in-law Maurice of Saxony, his people notwithstanding their sympathy with him to attain his release. He was compelled to renounce most of his opinions, and helped to reconcile Protestants and Roman Catholics at Worms.

Neri, St. [NERI, PHILIP.]

ST. PHILIP, AND ST. JAMES'S DAY.—The feast of St. Philip is kept on May 1st. St. Philip is said to have been killed at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, by a snake, or, according to another tradition, he was hanged to a pillar. St. James, the brother of John, is also surnamed "the Greater," to distinguish him from the brother of St. John the Evangelist, who was probably from being less in stature or younger than his namesake; and St. James is called "the Just," according to Hegesippus, on account of his exceeding righteousness. He is said to have been killed from a pinnacle of the temple, and his body was beaten out with a fuller's club. No reason is known for coupling these two saints, but they are associated in the Sacramentary of Gregory and in the Lectionary of St. Jerome, as in the English Prayer Book.

Philippists.—Followers of Philip Melancthon, and distinguished as endeavouring, but without success, to bring about a union between Protestant bodies, especially Lutherans and Calvinists.

Phillimore, Sir Robert Joseph, Bart. [b. at Whitehall, Nov. 5th, 1810; d. at Henley-on-Thames, Feb. 4th, 1885]. Having taken his degree at Christ Church, Oxford, he became an advocate at Doctor's Commons in 1839, and was called to the Bar in 1841; became Chancellor of the dioceses of Oxford, Salisbury, and Chichester, and Commissary of the Chapters of St. Paul's and Westminster; Judge of the Cinque Ports and Admiralty Advocate, 1855; Queen's Advocate-General, 1862; Dean of Arches, and Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, 1867; Master of the Faculties, 1871; and Justice in the Probate and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, 1875. He early became noted for his success as an advocate in ecclesiastical cases, and took part in all the prominent cases of ecclesiastical litigation which have had so marked an influence on modern Church history, notably that of Archdeacon Denison [1857]; "Poole v. the Bishop of London" [1859]; and the case of Essays and Reviews [1862]. His chief works as a legal author are Ecclesiastical Law of the Church of England and Commentaries on International Law, both of which hold a foremost place among law-books. The second gained for him a membership in the Institute of France.

Phillpotts, Henry, D.D., Bishop of Exeter [b. 1778, d. 1869], was born at Bridgewater, and was the son of a wholesale brickmaker. He received his education at the College School, Gloucester, and at Corpus Christi, Oxford. In 1795 he was elected a Fellow of Magdalen. On his marriage, in 1804, he gave up his Fellowship, and in 1806 became Chaplain to Dr. Shute Barrington, Bishop of Durham. He first distinguished himself in theological controversy by publishing a defence of an episcopal charge delivered by Dr. Barrington, whose remarks had been attacked by the Roman Catholic historian, Dr. Lingard. Three years afterwards he was made Prebendary of Durham, and held the cure of one of the largest parishes in that city for ten years, when he was preferred to the rich rectory of Stanhope. In 1821 he took his D.D., and in 1825 he entered into controversy with Mr. Charles Butler, the author of The Book of the Roman Catholic Church. Dr. Phillpotts published his answer in an octavo volume, entitled Letters to Charles Butler, Esq., on the Theological Parts of his Book of the Roman Catholic Church, with Remarks on Certain Works of Dr. Milner and Dr.

Lingard, and on some Parts of the Evidence of Dr. Doyle before the Committee of the Houses of Parliament. In the ensuing year Dr. Phillpotts followed up the controversy by the publication of A Supplemental Letter to Charles Butler, Esq., on some Parts of the Evidence given by the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops, particularly Dr. Doyle, before the Committee of the Two Houses of Parliament in the Session of 1825; and also on Certain Passages in Dr. Doyle's Essay on the Catholic Claims. In the year 1827, when the question of Roman Catholic Emancipation occupied so much public attention, Dr. Phillpotts published two Letters to Mr. Canning, in which he insisted, as he had done before in a Letter to Earl Grey, that the claims of the Catholics to political enfranchisement ought not to be conceded "without adequate securities for the Church of England." In 1828 he accepted the Deanery of Chester, and in 1830 became Bishop of Exeter. As the income of the See was only £2,700, he endeavoured to get permission to keep the rectory of Stanhope, worth £5,000 a year, in conjunction with the bishopric. This the Government refused, but suffered him to enjoy his Durham prebend, worth not much less, until his death. In Parliament, from 1830 to 1841, he was a bitter antagonist of the Whig Ministry. He was a most determined opponent of the Reform Bill, Irish Church Reform, National Education, the Ecclesiastical Commission, and the New Poor Law. He was a zealous maintainer of what he believed to be the rights, doctrines, and duties of the Church, and in his zeal involved himself in manifold litigations with both the clergy and laity of Devonshire. The most notable case was that of his refusal to institute the Rev. G. C. Gorham, on the ground of his imperfect belief in the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. [GORHAM CASE.] The case was decided against him, and he ever after that time refrained from any conspicuous action in the politics of the Church. He was a courageous defender of "sisterhoods" at a time when they were highly unpopular, and took the part of Miss Sellon at Devonport when a fierce outcry was raised against her. He died at Bishopstowe, near Torquay, in his 92nd year. A fortnight before his death he had tendered his resignation of the See, but he died before the legal arrangements were completed.

Philo.—A Jew of Alexandria [b. probably a few years B.C., d. during the reign of the Emperor Claudius]. Of his life nothing is known beyond what can be gathered from his writings. He was of noble family, of the sect of the Pharisees, and was well acquainted with the Old Testament Scriptures, as appears from his numerous writings. About 39 or 40 A.D. Philo was appointed to the head of an embassy sent by the Jews of Alexandria to the Emperor Caligula to petition redress from the injustice of the Governor Publius Avilius Flaccus in the manner in which the ambassadors were induced Philo to write his book Cum. At different times he visited, and other parts of Palestine; and that he made another journey to Rome in the reign of Claudius, but the story is supported by legends and is probably not true. His works of Philo are divided into three parts: the first containing Cosmopoeica, the second Historica, and the third Juridica. The influence of Philo's writings on Jewish, and through that upon Christian, theology and thought, has been great. He had practically mastered all the philosophy of his time, and his object was to show the Divine revelation as given to the Jews was consistent with the highest philosophy known to the ancients, and especially that of Plato. From the bold symbolism of the Jewish Scriptures he deduced the absolute necessity of a symbolical meaning, which required a systematic interpretation—a doctrine carried to still greater lengths in modern times by SWEDENBORG [q.v.]. This allegorism is carried much further in the first part of his works than in the last; but he does not deny also the literal sense, which, as he says, were the vehicle of the spiritual.

In Philo's system of Theistic Philosophy God is the one ideally good and perfect being, as with PLATO [q.v.]. As such He is incomprehensible and inscrutable, but He manifests Himself to man, and in the beginning, the Name, the Word, this manifestation is as natural as fire burning is to great heat. On the other hand, there exists a formless chaos, which God formed and fashions into a universe, and to bring such different existences into harmony an intermediary is required. This is the Logos [q.v.] or Word, as the intermediary between the higher and lower intelligent existences. The Logos at different times represented a Priest, the Image of God, His Son, the instrument of Creation, the first-born, the Archangel, and so on; and Philo identifies him with the Lord, or Angel of the Lord, who so often appeared to the Patriarchs.

In the Book of Wisdom we find an earlier form of Philo's doctrine, grafted upon Judaism, Wisdom being personified much in the same manner as the Logos of Philo. By the Hellenic philosophers the system of thought of Philo's grew was corrupted into a materialism. On the other hand, its relation to the Bible, once upon, Christian theology can be traced in St. John's phraseology of the Logos or Word, and the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which also gives examples of the allegorical method of interpretation Philo so largely adopted, as adly influenced ORIGEN [q.v.] and Christian Fathers. But as Farrar well says, while Philo's conception, splendid as it is, is vague, and only floats in the air, the difference between it and that of the Christian is as wide as that between the living and the dead." "The four words of 'The Word became flesh,' created an idea and tell us more, and give us a more definite conception, than all which Philo and the Jews, though it was given to them, could see through a glass darkly much more clearly, but also to prepare the way for the coming of its kingdom.

Phos [Gr. phōnaskeō, "to practise singing"].—In the ancient church, a pre-leader of the choir.

Photinus, Bishop of Sirmium [b. about 250 and a pupil of Marcellus. He held the doctrine that Christ began to be Christ only when the Spirit descended upon Him at His baptism. His doctrine was condemned by the Council of Antioch in 344, and by that of Milan in 351 at a Synod, which was assembled to consider his writings, condemned them; Photinus offered to defend his position in opposition to Basil of Ancyra, and his persisting in holding and publishing heretical doctrines, he was deposed from his office. It is not certain how long his schism lasted, but they are mentioned in existence in 381. None of his followers have survived.

Photius.—Patriarch of Constantinople [beginning of the ninth century, d. 891], of noble and rich parents, and of great reputation as a statesman. Although a layman, he was appointed to the throne in opposition to Ignatius, who was deposed and nominated by the Empress Theodora in favour of her son Michael III. Ignatius' son Photius was Bardas, the uncle of Michael III., who persuaded Gregory of Nazianzus to promote him, within six days, from the orders of monk, lector, sub-deacon, and presbyter, to the position of patriarch. Ignatius was banished to Terebinthus, but secured the support of many of the clergy, and wrote to the Pope asking to be reinstated as patriarch. The schism of Photius gained the victory, and he took the opportunity to create a difference between the Eastern and Western Churches, and, after calling together a synod, excommunicated the Pope. Shortly after Michael III. was assassinated, and Ignatius recalled, and caused him to be deposed, treated with ignominy, and banished. He was released after a few years, returned to Constantinople, where he reconciled to Ignatius, and became patriarch on the death of the latter in 878. He refused to recognise his claims, and was regarded with dislike by the people;

finally he was suspected of robbery and intrigue, and banished in 886 by the Emperor Leo to Armenia, where he remained until his death. Of his numerous works, by far the most valuable is the Bibliotheca, containing the names and short accounts of 248 authors, many of whom are unknown except from this work.

Piarists.—The Fathers of the Pious Schools, an institution founded by Joseph Calasanz at the end of the sixteenth century, sanctioned as a congregation by Pope Paul V. in 1617 (and therefore sometimes called Paulinians), and formed into an order by Gregory XV. in 1621. The object was at first to give poor children a religious education, and instruct them in reading and writing only; but afterwards a good modern education, including Latin, Greek, and philosophy, was given. They experienced some trouble from the jealousy of the Jesuits, but in 1870 numbered 2,000 religious. They have never entered Great Britain or France, but are chiefly confined to Italy, Spain, and Austro-Hungary. In the latter country there are said to be 20,000 children under their care.

Picards.—The name of a sect who, according to Sylvius and Varillas, carried the principles of the ADAMITES [q.v.] to the extravagance of going without clothes. It sprang up in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and took its name from Picard, a Fleming, who set it on foot. He travelled from Flanders into Germany, where it is said he deceived a great many people by his impostures. The Jesuit Balbinus, however, in his account brings no such charges, which many believe to have been mere calumnies charged against him on account of his denunciation of the Church of Rome; and Schlecta, secretary to King Ladislas of Bohemia, in his letters to Erasmus, gives an account from which it would appear the Picards were merely a division of the Vaudois or Waldenses. Picard settled at Tabor, near the river Lüschnitz, in Bohemia; was attacked by Zisca, and he and all his followers were killed, with the exception of two, who were saved that they might give an account of their opinions.

Pie.—The Ordinale or Pie was a table of directions for finding the services for the day in the old Office books, a process of some complexity. It is referred to in the preface to the Prayer Book "Concerning the Service of the Church" as follows:—

"The number and hardness of the rules called the Pie, and the manifold changings of the service, was the cause, that to turn the book only was so hard and intricate a matter that many times there was more business to find out what should be read, than to read it when it was found out."

The name "Pie" or "Pica" was in general use about the fifteenth century. Two derivations are proposed: [1] From the initial letter [pi] of the Greek word pinax, "a table or index." [2] From the Latin pica, "a magpie," so called from its pied or particoloured appearance, alluding to the employment of different coloured letters. [Cf. the phrase "the Pied Piper of Hamelin."] The printer's technical term "pie," applied to type in a state of confusion, is supposed to have been borrowed from the name of this index.

Pietists.—A party in the Lutheran Church formed first about the middle of the seventeenth century at Leipzig by Spener. He considered that the Bible was neglected in the studies ordered for young men at the University, and organised lectures and meetings for its more careful study. His preaching at Strassburg, Frankfort, and Dresden had great effect, and he insisted on a holy life in both teachers and taught. For this purpose, he formed schools called Collegia Pietatis, where men and women met together for prayer and instruction, and thence carried their influence throughout the land. The scheme was treated with some contempt, and those who took it up were nicknamed Pietists, on account of their alleged excessive piety as regards outward behaviour. The movement certainly did a great deal of good to society, instilling a purity of devotion in home life whose effects were lasting; and to it were due the foundation of German and Danish missions to the heathen. Amongst Spener's disciples were FRANCKE [q.v.], Thomasius, the Professor of Leipzig and Halle, and Bengel, the great commentator. Their teaching gained ground at Leipzig, but some of the more extreme Pietists so irritated the old school of theologians by their denunciation of the mere doctrinalism of many ministers in the Church, that at last the Docents were obliged to leave Leipzig. Frederick William I. of Brandenburg established the University of Halle in 1694, and through Spener's influence his friends found a refuge there, and it became the home of Pietistic professors, who first prelected on Scripture and founded the great exegetical literature of Germany. Afterwards they came into collision with the University of Wittenberg. Little more is heard of the party in the history of the Church till the beginning of the present century, when it was at the height of its power. It was entirely the result of the new wave of Evangelical teaching which passed all through Europe about the same time—waking men's consciences, making them dissatisfied with the rationalistic creed which had been considered sufficient the century before, and counterbalancing the refined indifference to religion which we find in the works of Goethe and some of his contemporaries. The work was to a great extent carried on by a publication called the Evangelical Church Journal. The views held by the members of this party were decidedly narrow.

As a groundwork they took the teaching either Luther or Calvin, but further proceeded to say, that those only who also held their views could hope to be saved; and it was the consequence of this that several famous learned divines, Neander amongst others, refused to join their ranks. It was not expected that the various members in all of Germany [for it was in that country Pietism was principally developed] would think exactly alike. One province was the work carried on in one way and another; and the consequence was that various communities were formed. The most famous of these was that which established itself at Kornthal, near Würtemberg. It was not in the least schismatic, taking the Augsburg Confession as its basis, but it made several minor alterations in the Latin Liturgy, and claimed absolute right to conduct its own affairs independently of the ordinary ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Würtemberg. The community is still in a flourishing condition, the church well attended, and the agricultural department a pattern to the surrounding country. Some of the schools, too, are so famous that many boys from America and England are sent there for their education. The population at the present time is about 1,000.

Pilgrimage.—A religious discipline which consists in making a journey to some place in order to adore the relics of a saint or to visit the scene of some event in sacred history. Pilgrimages were first made about the fourth century, and speedily came into vogue as an effectual means of penance, the most frequented places of devotion being Jerusalem, Rome, Tours and Compostella. The custom of going on pilgrimages reached its height about the eleventh and twelfth centuries when it was followed by all classes of men, from kings to peasants. The Church granted indulgences and special privileges to those who visited certain places of devotion, and some made it their calling in life to travel from one shrine to another. At some places, as at Loretto, and in our own days at Lourdes, it was said that the Virgin Mary had appeared and ordained that they should be consecrated to her service; while at other places, where relics of saints were said to exist, were ascribed wonderful powers for the healing or justification of those who visited them. In every country pilgrimages have been common. In England, the shrine of Thomas Becket was the chief resort of the pilgrims; in Scotland, St. Andrew's; in Ireland, various places. The practice has been discontinued among the Protestants, but is still common in Roman Catholic countries, and many shrines are held sacred, and visited for the expiation of sins or the healing of the infirm. Pilgrimages are not confined to Rome and the East; they are common among Mahomedans.

and Jews, and are connected with

Chief leaders at that time were William er, Elder of the Church; John Brad-often Governor of the colony; Ed-inslow, and Miles Standish, the mili-amander. The heaven was cloudy, the ere, the rain and snow pitiless; and for several months their privations were extreme. For years they were threatened alternately by starvation and extermination by the savages; but how they triumphed over these obstacles constitutes largely the early history of the United States, and need not be recounted here.

On June 24th, 1629, another colony in
John Endicott, at Salem, Massachusetts. This colony included Francis Higginson, a Puritan who had been driven from the Anglican ministry for his opinions, and many like-minded, who desired to retain what they considered true in their historic Church. Higginson had said on deck to his people, as the English cliffs receded from view: "We do not go to New England as separatists from the Church of England, though we cannot but separate from the corruptions in it." But it soon appeared that the more rigid Puritans had no real conception of the toleration they claimed, and ere long all the prominent Anglican Puritans were violently seized and sent back to England. How this spirit grew is also, unfortunately, matter of history, and the rigidity of the persecution was rather increased than otherwise by the attempt to make the Church synonymous with the State, so that no man could have even rights of citizenship unless he were a com-municant. The Book of Common Prayer became a "sinful violation of the worship of God," and the keeping even of Christmas Day was visited by a fine, as also was attendance at an Episcopal Church. Quakers were persecuted even to the death. Roger Williams was banished for no other crime than preaching full liberty of conscience, and the doors of Baptist meetings were nailed up.
The simple fact is that none of the religious bodies—only a few rare spirits here and there —understood as yet religious toleration; and the history and deeds of the Pilgrim Fathers form a striking and somewhat grim proof of this. Much of their civil and religious system also failed. Their civil laws were copied closely from those of Moses; and the rebellion of human spirits against overstrictness produced at length a state of morals beneath the surface, which Cotton Mather vividly delineates. They also professed hyper-Calvinism almost without exception, a system which the human heart is never long able to bear without protest [see ELECTION], and thus, as at Geneva, so in America, many of the direct descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers are now Unitarians. But we may also study with profit, and even reverence, their better side—their simplicity, their love to the truth as they saw it, their earnestness, their manly independence; and, remembering these, need not wonder at the part they played in the history of the world.

Pineda, JOHN.—A Jesuit of noble birth, born at Seville about the middle of the sixteenth century. He was a good linguist, and wrote commentaries on various parts of the Bible, and some theological works. Died Jan. 27th, 1637.

Pinelli, DOMENICO [b. at Genoa, 1541; d. 1611], Cardinal, son of Paris Pinelli and Benedetta Spinola. He was educated as a lawyer, and his remarkable talents and learning brought him under the notice of Pope Pius V., who employed him in business at the Court. Pope Gregory XIII., successor to Pius V., had also a great regard for Pinelli, and promoted him to be Auditor of the Rota, Clerk of his Chapel, Chamberlain of the Church, and Cardinal. He also sent him as Legate to Roumania, which was in a state of disturbance, and which Pinelli succeeded in quieting. The Pope afterwards put him in command of the fleet, and intrusted him with the completion of the seventh book of Decretals. Pinelli wrote a tract concerning the Pope's authority, and an account of the lives of St. Francis and other saints.

Pinson, FRANCIS, a lawyer [b. at Bourges, 1612, d. at Paris, 1691]. Most of his works deal with ecclesiastical law, the prerogative of the sovereign in disposing of ecclesiastical benefices, etc.

Pisa, COUNCILS OF.—The first Council of Pisa was summoned in 1409 to endeavour to restore the unity of the Church; it was unsuccessful, for instead of getting rid of the two contending Popes, Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII., it added a third to their number in the person of Alexander V. [PAPAL SCHISM.]

The second Council of Pisa was of little importance. It was summoned in 1511, in the time of Pope Julius II., ostensibly for the reformation of the Church. It arose out of a quarrel between the Pope and Louis XII. of France because the former refused to renew the League of Cambrai. The Council was composed chiefly of French clergy, and after a few sessions they removed to Milan, where they cited the Pope to appear, and on his refusal gave sentence of his suspension. Julius meantime held a Council of Italians in the Lateran, who excommunicated the members of the Council of Pisa. Louis soon after losing all his Italian conquests, had to submit, and the Council was at an end.

Piscina.—A small drain, or sink, near the altar in a church, generally placed in a niche in the wall, to receive and carry off the water in which the priest washed his hands, and also that used for rinsing the chalice.

Pistoia, SYNOD OF.—A Council was held at Pistoia, in the north-east of Tuscany, in 1782, to consider some articles prepared by Leopold, the Grand Duke, who wished to introduce certain Jansenist changes in the discipline of the Tuscan Church. There were present 234 priests. Ricci, Bishop of Pistoia, was a great ally of Leopold, and these doctrines of grace were approved, articles of a spiritual democracy were adopted, and decrees were passed condemning the Sacred Heart, missions, use of the Mass, etc., and ordering the destruction of altars and images. This led to a revolt of the people, Ricci had to resign his See, and seven years later Pope Pius VI. issued a Bull, Auctorem adeo, condemning Pistoian decrees, and Ricci had to resign.

Pits, JOHN, was born at Alton, towards the close of the sixteenth century, educated at Winchester, whence he was admitted to New College, Oxford. He was a Roman Catholic, and went to study and afterwards at Rheims, where he became a priest. He retired into France, and was for some time confessor to the Duke of Cleve, daughter of the Duke of La Rochefort. He died in 1616. He was the author of several treatises, De Beatitudine, De Imperio, De Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus.

Pius.—There have been nine Popes bearing this name. [POPE.] Of these the most important were the following:—

PIUS II. [Æneas Silvius Piccolomini] assumed the dignity from 1458 to 1464. He took the title of Pius in order to conform to the fashion of his former name Æneas. The Renaissance was in full swing, and Pius, following the fashion, claimed for himself descent from Virgil's hero. It was much more than this fashion had extended itself to a revival of sheer heathenism, and was not the only Pontiff whose reign was marked by one of negations and infidelity. He was a man of shameful life, lecherous, avaricious and grasping in old age.

PIUS IV., whose name before was Vannio Angelo Medici, was born on May Day, 1499, in Milan. He studied law, and in 1527 became Protonotary to the Curia of Clement VII. At the same time he was in the favour of the Cardinal Farnese, having been raised to the Papacy by the name of Paul III., made use of in several embassies, conferred on him several benefices, and created him Cardinal 8th, 1549. Julius III. made him Legate of the army against the Duke of Parma, who was, however, hostile to him. On his return from Rome to his native town of Vigevano, on Paul's death he was recalled, and on the 26th of May, 1550, he was crowned on the Papal Chair, being crowned on the 26th, 1550. He is chiefly noted as having opened the Council of Trent, Jan. 13th, 1562, and in spite of great difficulties it continued till Dec. 3rd, 1563. [TRENT, COUNCIL.] The well-known creed called the Credo IV., or the Tridentine Creed, was promulgated as an embodiment of all the doctrine in that Council. 1792, d. 1878] was born at 13th, 1792. His name was Mastai-Ferretti, and his rd extraction. He received his education at the Ecclesiastical College of Volterra, which he quitted in 1810. Five years later he entered the Guardia Nobile of the Vatican; but he soon chose the ecclesiastical profession, was ordained, and for several years was chaplain to some hospitals in Rome, and enjoyed the good-will of Pius VII., though filling no post at his Court. In 1823 he went out in the suite of Monsignor Muzzi, Apostolic Vicar in Chili, and travelled over a considerable part of South America. On his return Leo XII. made him Prelate in his household, gave him a canonry in Santa Maria di Via Lata, and named him President of St. Michael's Hospital in Via Grande. In 1827 he was created Archbishop of Spoleto, and in 1832 transferred to the See of Imola. In the interval Leo XII. had died [1829], and had been followed by Pius VIII., after whose death, in 1831, Gregory XVI. came to the throne. Those were years of great political commotion throughout Europe, and specially in Italy and the Roman States, where the successors of Pius VII. had departed from the mild and wise rule introduced at his restoration by Cardinal Consalvi, and had aggravated their temporal misrule by the reckless exercise of spiritual tyranny. The accession of Gregory was the signal for an insurrectionary outbreak in Central Italy, and Mastai-Ferretti, in his diocese of Spoleto, had to stand the brunt of the movement, and had no little trouble in assuaging the violent passions which raged around him; but his reputation as a man of liberal and benevolent opinions greatly aided him. His removal from the archbishopric of Spoleto to the bishopric of Imola was probably owing to the displeasure of Gregory at Mastai-Ferretti's humane and enlightened views of a Pontifical Government. At Imola he remained true to his liberal views, and shone as a reformer of abuses, encouraging a more extensive knowledge in his diocesan seminary; he founded an Academia Biblica, somewhat on the plan of the Protestant Bible Societies, aiming at the diffusion of Hebrew history and the discussion of Scriptural subjects. He enjoyed a great popularity in his diocese, where he was called "the good Bishop." He was sent on a mission to Naples, and while there the cholera broke out, and he disposed of his plate and furniture in order to bestow their proceeds on the sufferers. He was made a Cardinal in 1840, assuming the title of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus, and continued to reside in his diocese till 1846, when Gregory XVI. died. The Conclave to elect his successor met on June 14th, and the two parties of the Sacred College had each their favourite candidate; those who wished for moderation choosing the Bishop of Imola, while those who clung to the old system put forward the Secretary of State, Cardinal Lambruschini. Mastai-Ferretti was elected by thirty-six out of the fifty voters present, and was crowned on June 21st, 1846, with the title of Pius IX. The first act of his pontificate was to release from their prison all the political offenders placed there by his predecessors, it is said to the number of 2,000; he recalled all exiles and restored them to their civil rights on the sole condition of their signing a declaration of allegiance. This act was received with acclamation, and created a perfect frenzy in the Catholic world throughout Europe. Austria and France, however, were greatly displeased at the Pope's measures of reform. In the great struggle of 1848 he refused to fight against Austria in defence of his Italian subjects, and on a rising of the populace in Rome he saw no way of safety except in flight, in which he was assisted by the Bavarian minister, Count Spaur, who conveyed him safely over the frontier, Nov. 24th, 1848. He took refuge at Gaëta, under the protection of Naples, and went thence to Portici, and it was not till April, 1850, that he returned to Rome. Pius IX. was now an altered man; he seemed to repent of his short whim of patriotism and liberalism, and he gave up all personal rule and allowed himself to be guided entirely by the unscrupulous Cardinal Antonelli, who had shared his exile, and whom he made his Secretary of State. The Pope felt that his political career on the throne had been a failure; but he still clung to the fond conceit that his pontificate was destined to eclipse the glory of his most renowned predecessors. So now he turned to the Church that attention which before his flight he had almost exclusively bestowed on the State. He summoned Jesuit theologians to his side, reconstituted their scattered order, and canonised saints, lavished indulgences, countenanced miracles, attempted and enforced conversions, marked out new dioceses in Protestant communities, and at last ventured on subtle polemic discussions and daring definitions of new dogmas. Thus, he proclaimed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, Dec. 8th, 1854, and the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, July, 1870. By degrees his dominions were wrested from him, and on Sept. 20th, 1870, Rome itself, and with it ended the temporal power of Pius IX. The Vatican alone was left him, and to that palace and its garden he confined himself year after year. From thence he filled the world with his grievances by means of endless encyclical letters, freely printed in Italian and other newspapers. He lived to the age of eighty-six, dying Feb. 7th, 1878. His pontificate lasted thirty-six years, the longest on record.

Placet [placetum regium, regium exequatur, litteræ pareatis].—A confirmation of Church law, Papal bulls, or briefs, formerly required to be given by the State before such law could be put into execution. This was made compulsory in England by the Statute of Præmunire, 1393, which "vindicated the right of the Church of England to prohibit mission or the execution of all Papal briefs within the realm." In the Catholic Church it is no longer so; in regards matters of doctrine, ritual, Sacraments; in other matters it is limited to an appeal to the Pope, and bishops if any constitution appears to be unfitted for enforcement in the country. The Pope denies the right of the laity to interfere in ecclesiastical matters, and an attempt to prevent the carrying out of a Papal decree are under a penalty of excommunication; but, nevertheless, concessions are occasionally made in order to prevail.

Platina, BARTHOLOMEUS [b. in 1421; d. at Rome, 1481]. He was the son of poor parents of the name of Sacchi. The name of Platina refers to the place or Piadena, where he was born. He came to Rome, where his talents brought him the notice of Pope Pius II., who made him Apostolical Abbreviator; and afterwards made him Assistant Librarian of the Vatican. He wrote Opus Summorum Pontificum, published in 1479, which gives an account of the lives of the Popes from Eugenius IV. to the death of Paul II. He died at Rome. He wrote a history of the Popes and other works.

Plato, the greatest writer of philosophy, was born at Athens a.c. 427. The details of his early life little known. He was well educated, and devoted the first years of his life to writing poetry; at the age of twenty became acquainted with CRATES [q.v.], and in consequence turned to the study of philosophy. It is the biographer of the Greek philosopher that once upon a time Socrates drew him. He found an unfledged cygnet on the banks of the Ilissus. In a few moments it became wild and flew away, uttering sweet sounds. Plato came, and Socrates felt his heart filled. From that time Plato became identified with his master that his individuality is almost lost. Some of the writings attributed to him are certainly spurious, but some fragments of them may be given us some information respecting his travels in Sicily. The form which he used to express his philosophy, that of the dialogue, was not an invention intended to make truth in attractive form. It was his desire from his heart to elucidate and to give all sides full consideration to doubts and objections expressed, but they are such as suggest to many minds, and, therefore, have "The dialogues of Plato," says conduct, does not terminate here, but takes in also the right direction of the rational powers. [3] The good which supplies the proper human aim is not merely subjective and dependent on the constitution of the human faculties; it has an objective reality, which would remain though we were not.

Ere anything perishable arose, it was. It existed separately, and justifies, therefore, its assumption of the name God. [4] This highest good exists in us and out of us. Its various types, embodied in the visible universe, are also indigenous treasures of the human mind, which has pre-existed as well as they, and been familiar with them in an earlier state. Whatever is good is evolved from us by appeal to memory; virtue is learning, and learning is remembrance. [5] It follows from this that our relation to God as the Divine ground and source of the universe is a relation of likeness, arising from identity of essence—of the little to the great, the mixed and disguised to the pure and clear, the partial copy to the perfect original." [Types of Ethical Theory, vol. i.
pp. 84–86.] The learned author shows in a very grand passage which follows where the Platonic idea fell short of the Christian.

Platonism has been made by Providence one of the most powerful handmaids of Christianity. It underlies the grand philosophy of the apocryphal books of "Ecclesiasticus" and the "Wisdom of Solomon," writings of Alexandrian Jews who had drunk deep of the Platonic writings. PHILO's teaching concerning the Logos was derived from the same source, and St. John was inspired to show how far he was right, and how the ideals had been fulfilled in the Incarnate Word. The Alexandrian divinity was Platonic [NEO-PLATONISTS; CLEMENT OF ALEX-ANDRIA], and some of the greatest of English philosophers have drawn their doctrines from the same fountains. [COLERIDGE. See next

Platonists, CAMBRIDGE.—In the seventeenth century a number of graduates, fellows, tutors, and masters of colleges in the Cambridge University, most of them from Emmanuel College, revived the study of Plato and his philosophy, and therefore were called the Cambridge Platonists. They were chiefly of Puritan origin and sympathies, but their great aim was to sink all minor differences and endeavour to find a basis of broad Catholic Christian views, in which charity should be the living principle. They were true and devoted Churchmen and believed all the Christian doctrines, yet looked on them from a Platonic point of view, endeavouring to assimilate the doctrines of Plato, and to apply to them the distinctive Christian doctrines. The four chief Platonists were Benjamin Whichcote, John Smith, Henry More, and Ralph Cudworth, accounts of whom will be found under their several names.

Among the minor members were Simon Patrick, John Worthington, while some members of Oxford University, as Joseph Glanvil and John Wilkins, were also so closely connected with the Cambridge Platonists that they are counted as belonging to the same school of thought.

Plenary Indulgence is the remission of all the temporal punishment due to sin. [INDULGENCES.] Plenary indulgences are granted in England at the eight great festivals of the Roman Church, and are sometimes granted by the Pope to the whole Church on solemn occasions, such as a jubilee. They may also be gained by the recitation of certain prayers, or by the performance of good works prescribed by the Church, provided that the person desirous of gaining them be in a state of grace, and penitent for the sins committed. It is also believed that plenary indulgences can be granted to the dead for the remission of the pains of purgatory. Plenary indulgences have been granted largely to confraternities, to the use of certain crucifixes and rosaries, and to pilgrimages to the chief churches at Rome or elsewhere.

Pliny the Younger—so called to distinguish him from his uncle, the celebrated naturalist, whose adopted son he was, and who perished in the great eruption of Vesuvius—was a disciple of Quintilian, and appears to have been, though a heathen, an amiable and just, as well as an able and learned man. He was the friend and favourite of the Emperor Trajan, and while Consul, he delivered in the Senate a panegyric on his patron, which is still extant. In A.D. 103 he was sent as Governor to Bithynia, and there found a state of things which alarmed him. The progress of Christianity had been such that the heathen temples were almost deserted, and the sellers of victims for sacrifice could find no purchasers for their wares; people of both sexes, of all ages and ranks, had adopted the "foreign superstition." And this was not confined to the cities—it had spread to villages and rural districts.

There was then, probably, no definite enactment directed against the Christians; but, nevertheless, they were generally treated as offenders. Their refusal to worship the image of the Emperor, or to sacrifice to idols for his safety, and, more than all, their nocturnal meetings, caused them to be suspected of disaffection towards the Government. Besides this, it was popularly reported and believed that they practised abominable and revolting rites at their secret meetings: for instance, that they were in the habit of killing new-born infants, tearing them in pieces, and drinking their blood. These fictions, though they may not have been believed by Pliny, could not but heighten the feelings of suspicion and dislike with which the Christians were regarded. Acount Pliny never doubted that it was his duty to punish Christians, but he was uncertain the amount of punishment and the trial. To satisfy his mind he addressed the Emperor a letter [Ep. 96, book x.], is famous as containing a testimony to the piety and good general character of the Christians, a testimony which is peculiarly valuable as coming from an enemy, and one who thoroughly investigated the subject.

In this Epistle he makes particular in on three main points: (1) whether you old should receive the same punishment whether those who recanted should be done; and (3) whether the very fact of a Christian was in itself an offence, at no other crime could be brought home person charged. He then goes on to detail what had hitherto been his own usual procedure: First, he asked the accused acknowledged themselves Christians, if they did not deny the accusation, posted the question, with a threat of for refusing to renounce their opinions, if they still adhered to their profession ordered them to be led away to execution "never doubting that stubbornness; flexible obstinacy ought to be punished; states that he had examined several whom anonymous charges had been put but those all abjured Christianity, if the gods, offered supplications with frankincense to the image of the Emperor and reviled the name of Christ, "with of which things," he says, "can there are really Christians be induced to do? Some of these persons, however, on that they had once been Christians, long recanted, some as long as twenty before. From them he gathered the particulars concerning the superstitious adherents were in the habit of meeting together on a fixed day before it was singing hymns to Christ as a God, and themselves with an oath to abstain from and adulteries. Then they separated met again to eat bread, which last, however, was given up when he published Emperor's edict forbidding secret meetings.

This account was confirmed in every particular by two maid-servants, whom he examined by torture.

Trajan, in answer, assured Pliny he approved of the measures he had taken, instructed him that search was not to be for Christians; but those who were brought before him were to be executed unless recanted. If they recanted they were forgiven. He added that anonymous accusations were to be disregarded.

These letters are included amongst Pliny's Epistles, a collection of his correspondence in ten books. Their genuineness has been questioned, but there is no foundation in doubt.

with Brethren. — The name was given, but not acknowledged by them, they call themselves simply “Brethren.” A sect now divided into several, having come into existence without any previous connection between the years 1826 and 1830; spread considerably in England, and the Continent, and which presents in its history, and not least in its errors and mistakes, points of considerable interest. Strange as it may appear in a body now become almost a byword for sectarian bitterness, the movement took its rise in a sincere desire after more Christian union amongst different denominations, informal meetings being held at private houses for united study of the Scriptures, and mutual edification on grounds common to all. This took place at first chiefly in Ireland, especially in Dublin, where the Anglican Church itself, as natural from local circumstances, possessed at that time a marked ultra-Protestant character. A little later it appeared, to some taking part in these meetings [nearly all of whom practically held Zwinglian views concerning the Lord’s Supper], that there was “nothing in Scripture” to hinder those thus meeting together from celebrating the Lord’s Supper amongst themselves; and this began to be done, one of the most prominent in these proceedings being Mr. Anthony Norris Groves, a gentleman who afterwards gave up a dentist’s practice worth £3,000 a year to go out as a missionary to Bagdad. About the year 1830 the movement was joined by the Rev. J. N. Darby, born in 1800, and a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, who up to 1827 had been a curate in the Church of England and Ireland, but who had left that body from conscientious motives. Darby’s strong character and considerable gifts in the exposition of Scripture gave him almost at once a commanding influence, and from the date of his accession the movement spread rapidly, especially at Plymouth, where he was joined by the Rev. Benjamin Wills Newton, another Anglican clergyman of great popularity, and the Rev. James L. Harris. Another early accession was the well-known Dr. Samuel Pridcaux Tregelles.

Meeting at first on a footing of perfect equality as above stated, the body adopted, almost as a matter of course, the views of FRIENDS [q.v.] in regard to ministry, except that they have never allowed women to exercise ministerial gifts. They also adopted the practice, almost from the first, of a weekly observance of the Lord’s Supper. At this observance one of the elder brethren recites St. Paul’s account of the institution, in the manner usual among Dissenting bodies, and offers prayer and thanks before partaking of each of the elements. These are passed round from hand to hand, the bread being unseparated and a piece broken off by each in turn, as in their opinion a fitter symbol of the “One Bread” of which all partake. Their public ministry consists largely of exposition of the Scriptures, and there is usually considerable singing [without instrumental aid] and prayer in their meetings. Their theology is almost universally of a strong Calvinistic type, with in many places a considerable leaning to Antinomianism, and the majority of the communities hold Baptist views, and administer that Sacrament by immersion, though Mr. Darby himself and some of his followers advocated and practised infant baptism. As a rule Brethren are strong believers in what is known as the "literal and verbal" inspiration of the Scriptures, and accordingly study its letter with assiduity, and possess a large amount of Scripture knowledge of a certain kind, but with a strong tendency to mystical interpretation. The majority of them have generally held millenarian views respecting the second Advent of Christ.

As Methodists have their "class meetings" and Moravians their "love-feasts," so Brethren still maintain very commonly what they call "reading-meetings." Some of these are held in a public room; but ordinarily a more limited circle meet for tea at the house of one of their number, after which prayer is offered, and a portion of Scripture being read verse by verse, a general conversation takes place upon each verse, under the practical but informal presidency of one or more of the most experienced members present.

For eight or ten years Brethrenism spread rapidly: but from a very early period Darby's peculiar temperament led him to insist upon the duty of "coming out from among the sects," a view of Christian conduct which was foreign to the original intention, but was later formulated in a pamphlet entitled, Separation from Evil God's Principle of Unity. It was not perceived that, since the very "sects" themselves never professedly drew off from one another, but on many occasions sought to show and to profess their essential unity, to act thus was not only to establish a new sect, but to make it the most sectarian of any.* Brethren themselves, however, remained apparently united till about 1845, when Darby returned to England after some years' absence on the Continent, and at once accused Newton at Plymouth of taking too prominent a part in the meetings, and thus reviving "clericalism." On this ground Darby set up a rival meeting to that under Newton's influence, and two years later formally excommunicated Newton and his adherents on the ground of heretical doctrine. This was not without some foundation; for Newton, led away by the literal application to Christ (according to methods of interpretation common amongst Brethren) of every passage in the Messianic Psalms, had undoubtedly taught that our Lord (though taking the position with and on behalf of man, and entirely in grace) commenced his human life under the dissatisfaction of His Father, from which He had to work His way up, by His perfect obedience, to a position of acceptance. There can, however, be no doubt that Darby's own proceedings were embittered by rivalry which had sprung up before; and this was shown more following year, when Darby demanded a large meeting, held at "Bethesda" Bristol, should agree in excommunication ipso facto, all coming from Newton at Plymouth, failing which he excommunicated them also. The Bristol Brethren then presided over by Mr. George educated as a missionary to the Jews. Rev. Henry Craik, born and educated in Scotland as a Baptist minister, but possessed great influence, and when it was sufficient to examine into heresies as actually held by each whenever he sought fellowship. There were now a Newtonian party (called "exclusives"), and another party. There was another secession years later under a former clergyman, Cluff, who adopted Perfectionist views only in 1881, the year before his death, was forsaken by Mr. William Kelly, and his most earnest fellow-workers up to then through the whole history. Before this, however, there had been numerous secessions and sub-divisions of smaller magnitude, so that in a city like Bath there were at one time no less than five, if not six, distinct sects of "Brethren." Most of these divisions have taken place concerning mysterious points as to the nature or work of Christ, and in their results have been unparalleled for the bitter feelings evoked. A case came to the knowledge of the present writer in which husband and wife, taking different sides on such questions, had refused to speak or hold any intercourse for years, even refusing to sit down to eat in company; and such results amongst old and dear friends have been counted by scores. It is remarkable that Darby himself, towards the close of his life, taught, in print, doctrine which is absolutely undistinguishable from that for which he had excommunicated Newton many years before, being led to it in exactly the same way, and being left by some of his old adherents on that account; but to the last he spoke and wrote of his own exclusive communion as "the Church of God on earth," and as the sole true representative of that mystical body. The majority of other Brethren, however, have not carried their pretensions, extreme as they are, to such a length as this.

The feeling of resentment cherished toward Plymouth Brethren by most other denominations may be partly accounted for by the facts above stated, but not entirely. A more active cause for it consists in the fact that the body has in the main always directed its propagandist efforts far less towards the large residuum which unhappily lies outside of all Churches, than to those professing Christianity in Churches already existing.

practice as well as doctrine differs amongst Plymouth Brethren to a considerable extent, and also that there must be another side to such a dark picture. The diligent study of Scripture, though not always on wise methods, and the earnest Christian lives of the majority, are worthy of emulation by other denominations. They support (their own) foreign missions largely in proportion to their numbers, and very generally maintain their own poor. Some meetings recognise no paid ministry at all, while others do recognise some as having given themselves entirely to the service of the Church, and such are supported by the congregations; but always by voluntary contributions, usually dropped anonymously into boxes at the doors. Expenses of their meeting-houses are met in the same way. Some large congregations, such as those in connection with "Bethesda" at Bristol (now grown into three or four large meetings), might in practice be almost described as ordinary Baptist Churches "with an open ministry and weekly communion," and have very friendly relations with the other Churches around them; but this is the exception.

It is impossible to give the numbers of Brethren, because many of them object to make any returns; indeed, a distinct majority of individual members even object to give a vote, or take any part in civic affairs, though this is no part of the system. Their numbers are, however, unquestionably extending, and in all large cities several large meetings are generally to be found. In London, estimates vary between 15,000 and 25,000 in Church-fellowship, and in Bristol there are about 1,500, not including non-members or children in the same families. On the Continent they are strongest in French Switzerland, but have meetings and missions in all the European countries.

The literature of Brethrenism is very voluminous. Mr. Darby's own works have been published in 32 vols., and their doctrinal tracts and controversial or expository pamphlets can only be numbered by hundreds, the greater part of which, however, have passed into oblivion.

Pocock, EDWARD, D.D., a famous Orient-alist [b. 1604, d. 1691]. was born, educated, and died at Oxford. In 1630 he went to Aleppo, where he made a collection of Oriental manuscripts and coins at the request of Archbishop Laud; he continued his researches for two years in Constantinople. In 1636 he became Professor of Arabic at Oxford, and in 1643 Rector of Childrey, in Berkshire; in 1648

Canon of Christ Church. He was famed for his knowledge of Oriental languages, and for his valuable collection of antiquities, and wrote numerous works, antiquarian as well as theological. Among the latter are various commentaries on books of the Old Testament, and he translated the English Liturgy into Arabic.

Pœnitentiale.—A manual for priests, relating to the subjects of confession and penance.

Poggio Bracciolini [b. 1380, d. 1459] was secretary to no less than eight Popes, holding his office for nearly half a century. He was appointed by Boniface IX., and held office during the great schism, attending Pope John XXIII. to the Council of Constance. He is honourably known to posterity as the visitor to monasteries and the discoverer of several important MSS., some of them works up to that time supposed to be lost. He witnessed the martyrdom of Jerome of Prague, and wrote a vivid account to his life-long friend Bruni, in which he expressed his pity and admiration of the martyr so strongly that Bruni wrote back to warn him to suppress his feelings, lest he should share a like fate. After the Council was dissolved he went to England, whether in disgust at the corruption of the Papal Court (as some assert) is unknown, but he was the guest of Cardinal Beaufort. In some of his letters he gives amusing accounts of English life and character, not flattering to us. He soon returned to Italy, and resumed his duties, but sat somewhat loose to them, spending much time at Florence, and continuing his quest for MSS. He wrote some essays and disquisitions against the vices of the clergy, and especially of the monks, but his own writings are much disfigured by licentiousness. After fifty years' service he finally retired from the Court, and wrote the history of Florence. There he died, and was buried with great honours in the church of Santa Croce. His varied life, his high position, the services which he rendered to literature, and his own works, made him one of the most remarkable literary men of the fifteenth century.

Points, HEBREW.—The Hebrew points which stand for vowels have led to great controversies. It was generally believed that they were added by Ezra to the Chaldee alphabet, till Elias Levita, a German Jew, contradicted this opinion about the sixteenth century. He was upheld by Louis Cappel, a French Protestant and Hebrew Professor at Saumur [d. 1658], who in Arcanum Punctiones Revelatum, and Diatriba de Veris et Antiquis Hebræorum Literis maintained the comparatively recent introduction of the Hebrew points. He was opposed by the Buxtorfs, father and son, the former of whom [d. 1629] wrote Concordantiæ Bibliorum Hebraicæ et Chaldaicæ, and the latter [d. 1664], De Libris Hebraicarum genuinis Antiquitatibus, De Punctionum Origine, etc. In later times Dr. Humphrey Prideaux [d. 1724] wrote on this subject, and endorsed Cappel's opinion that the vowel points were invented by Masorites shortly after Ezra's time, but not received in the public schools till after composing of the Talmud.

Pole, REGINALD, Cardinal and Archbishop of Canterbury [b. in Sussex, March, 1500; Lambeth, Nov. 18th, 1558, within a few days of the death of Queen Mary]. He was related to royalty through his mother, Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, the niece of Edward IV., and was educated at the University of Oxford and afterwards in Italy, where he remained from 1520 to 1523. Though not ordained until many years later, Pole held several ecclesiastical appointments, whence he derived a large income; but in 1535 he lost it through the publication of a book called Unitate Ecclesiæ, in which he expressed his disapproval of the project for the King's divorce from Catharine of Arragon. Afterwards he started for Rome, where Pope Paul III., having made him a Cardinal, sent him to assist in the scheme which was being formed in the Netherlands to dethrone King Henry. The plot failed, and he received other commissions in Spain and elsewhere; but he was generally looked upon with suspicion as a traitor, and his mother and brothers were put to death by Henry VIII. in 1541, on the charge of being concerned in his treason. He returned to England in 1554 on the accession of Queen Mary, was made Archbishop of Canterbury, received England to Papal allegiance in a solemn ceremony held in Old Palace Yard, and devoted himself to the task of restoring the Papal authority in England. How far he is held responsible for the persecutions which blackened Mary's unhappy reign is a disputed question. Mr. Froude is of opinion that he was the mainspring of the course which Archbishop Parker called him Curia flagellum Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, "the scourge and scourge of the English Church." He was, nevertheless, believed by many to be secretly attached to Lutheranism, especially to the doctrine of Justification by Faith. The book De Beneficio dei Jesu Christi has been attributed to him. He had received the majority of votes for the throne on the death of Pope Paul III. in 1549, but was debarred from the honour on the ground of holding heretical opinions. He was summoned in 1557 to answer to the charge before the Inquisition, but he died before the appointed date of the trial, and was pronounced by the tribunal after his death a heretic. His personal character was irreproachable. Froude says that he was enormous

He studied now, and received his licence to preach United Secession Church in 1827, but only once. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, was a St. John, and by some is thought the angel of Smyrna on whose act St. John received a message in the Revelation. Soon after his accession Marcus Aurelius ordered a persecution throughout his empire. The Christians in sufferings so bravely that they are by a writer of that time in the following words:—"At the time of their torture seemed absent, as it were, from them, or rather that the Lord, being present with them, conversed familiarly with them, and thus they were supported by the grace of God." The mob were so angry at this that they determined to have him as one of their victims. He was of the arrival of the officers, so had take refuge in a neighbour's house, and thence retired to a small village on the skirts of Smyrna. He might have been safely for sometime, but the officers of his slaves to reveal the bishop's place. When they came to take him and led towards them with great kindness, refreshments before them with his own. He asked leave to have a quiet hour, and then expressed himself ready to go with them. On the way back to the soldiers tried to tempt him to saying that there could be no harm in using the words "Lord Cæsar," or in sacrifice, and yet by such trivial means he might save his life. He did not listen to them at first, and when absolutely forced to speak he only said, "I will obey your advice." He was given a chance by the Proconsul while the were preparing the stake at which he was to be burnt alive. The Proconsul said, "Swear by the fortunes of Cæsar: curse Christ, and I will set thee free." But Polycarp quietly answered, "Eighty and six years have I served Christ; how, then, can I curse Him, my King and my Saviour?" The herald was ordered to proclaim that Polycarp had admitted that he was a Christian, and then the fire was kindled. Soon after his death one of his followers, Irenæus, wrote an account of his life and death, and some of his congregation met together to settle how they should commemorate the memory of one to whom they all owed so much. They agreed that they would solemnly keep the day of his martyrdom every year, which they called his "birthday." This is probably the origin of keeping Saints' Days.

Polygamy.—Though the law of Moses did not forbid polygamy, the spirit of the Jewish religion was clearly and unmistakeably against the practice, and before the time of Christ monogamy had come to be regarded as God's appointment to man. When Christianity was first preached in the world, however, polygamy was in practice among heathens, and, as we shall presently see, there is good reason for assuming that it was not made a bar to admission to Christianity any more than was the holding of slaves, and that it was the spirit of Christianity, and not enactments, which finally drove it out of the Church.

In the last century a London clergyman (no other than the author of the popular hymn, "Lo, He comes in clouds descending"), observing with sad eyes the prevalence of immorality and the wide extent of female dishonour, wrote a work entitled Thelyphthora, in which he maintained that cases of seduction should necessitate marriage, and thus, that polygamy should be legalised in the interest of morality. This singular book is now only remembered as having called forth an indignant satire of Cowper against it. Few nowadays would believe that such a doctrine could obtain in a Christian country. But another question has arisen of a very serious character. Polygamy is in use among the Mohammedans and in heathen countries; and it is a difficult and much debated question what attitude ought to be taken by the Christian Church with respect to converts from heathenism who have a plurality of wives. Bishop Colenso, before publishing his works on the sacred narrative which made his name so prominent in theological controversy, had boldly expressed his conviction that a Caffre or Zulu who embraced the Gospel ought not to be compelled to put away his wives before being admitted to baptism. And ever since then, the question has been a moot point among those who are engaged in missionary work. At the Wakefield Church Congress held in October, 1886, the subject was somewhat fully discussed, and by giving an abstract of the arguments used there, we shall be enabled to see what is the prevailing opinion in the Anglican Church at the present time. The Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Bickersteth, read the first paper. He first, by a careful induction of passages from the Old Testament, proved what we have already stated, that it became more and more apparent to the Jewish mind that polygamy was opposed to the original institution of marriage and to the Divine Will. He quoted among other passages Ps. cxxviii. 3; Prov. v. 15-18; Eccl. ix. 9; Mal. ii. 14, 15; Mark x. 5-9; 1 Cor. vii. 3; Eph. v. 25-32.

"Bearing these Scriptures in mind," he went on, "we may confidently say that Christianity, as it prevails, will assuredly in time abolish polygamy, as it abolishes all other social evils. But the question which now presses for a definite answer in so many of our mission fields is not whether a Christian convert from among the heathens or Moslems may after his baptism take to himself more wives than one, because the practice is legal among his heathen or Mohammedan fellow-countrymen. This we should all refuse him, as contrary to the law of Christ and his baptismal vow. But the question is, ought a man who has married more wives than one in the days of his heathen or Mohammedan darkness to be refused Christian baptism if he will not put away all wives but one? And ought the second, or third, or fourth wife of such a man to be refused baptism if she will not leave her husband?" The Bishop then quoted General Gordon, as saying that he could convert all Africa with ease if a continuance of polygamy to such an extent might be allowed. Then, having said that missionaries in general appear to refuse baptism to those converts who decline to put away all wives but one, he proceeds to ask, "If, then, the man determines to be baptised at any cost, the terrible question must arise, which wife must he retain, and what is to become of those he rejects? Suppose a not improbable case. A man has three wives, the first old and childless, the second the mother of all his children, the third the last married and the best beloved. And yet this is the sore necessity to which some would reduce the catechumen who desires baptism." Henry Venn has answered, that as the first marriage only is legal the first wife must be kept, and the others repudiated as unlawful connections. "But," says the Bishop, "does this hold good? In the case supposed, the convert would have no choice. But surely the second marriage is as much a marriage, according to the laws of the country in which the matrimonial contract was made, as the first marriage and the first wife. When Jacob had married Leah and Rachel, would he have been right to put away the mother of Joseph on the plea that the first marriage was the only true marriage? I trow not. In saying this, I do not justify polygamy, but there are constraints according to the laws of the country where those contracts are made, though with human infirmity, and in them faithful to the contractor, which, when tried, honesty and honour, fidelity man, forbid him to violate. Such the legal marriage of a polygamist after his conversion appear to be. A man who 'swearth to his neighbour, and doth him not, though it be to his own hurt, is among those who the inspired apostle assures us shall never fall."

The Bishop then refers to 1 Tim. Tit. i. 6, where it is ruled that a man must be "the husband of one wife". which the earliest commentators were unanimous in interpreting as forbidding a man who had been a simultaneous polygamist to hold the past and as implying thereby that one who had married more wives than one was compelled to put them away; yea, divorces would have been doing without producing bad consequences in domestic life and increasing the opposition of the civil powers to Christianity. And it comes to the resolution, "I would baptise a polygamist, but if a man who converts took to himself more wives I think he ought to be excommunicated. This discipline faithfully observed in the case of a conversion of a tribe or a nation to Christianity, would stamp out polygamy in a single generation." We have only a few main points of an elaborate and interesting paper. The Bishop of Zululand took the other hand, that polygamists should be baptised. If Christianity was to abolish polygamy by its own force, that force must not be allowed to become less by any means of our own. If the heathen marriage contract was not one which he could at present recognise. The Rev. Johnson, a native missionary of West Africa, took the same view. "The question is whether they would be laying too great a burden upon a convert in requiring him to give up all his wives but one before baptism. But if polygamy was degrading to manhood, and injurious to man's moral character, and if baptism was a means of inward grace and consecration to God, in his opinion, they had no right to baptise a polygamist into the Christian Church." The Rev. J. A. Faithfull, who presided at the meeting, said he hoped that no one would entertain the idea that the Bishop or any other churchman, wished to retain polygamy. The question was simply a practical one. Some persons were not quite clear that the Scripture explicitly forbade a polygamist to be baptised, and they questioned whether he would have a right to withhold baptism from a polygamist convert without compelling him to put away all his wives but one. He felt that under certain circumstances

edited by Brian Walton, afterwards Bishop of Chester. There are two sets of copies—the Republican [1657], those dedicated to Oliver Cromwell, and the Loyal [1660], which were dedicated to Charles II. on his accession. The work engaged all the most learned men in England for many years. It contains Hebrew, Samaritan, Greek, Arabic, Chaldee, Ethiopic, Syriac, Persic, and Latin versions, all but the Vulgate being accompanied with literal Latin translations. The sixth volume contains various readings and critical remarks. The Prolegomena by Walton discusses Bible texts

Polytheism, as the word implies, is the belief in and worship of many gods—whether one god is considered supreme or not—as distinguished from the worship of the one true God only. Although there is reason to believe that heathen religions were anciently monotheistic, they certainly became polythe-istic, and are so now. We infer from the history in Genesis and Joshua xxiv. 2 that, although the family of Abraham in Ur worshipped the one true God, they likewise believed in and worshipped other false gods as lesser deities.
"Every form of Polytheism has sprung from Nature-worship. Man looked round on the powers of Nature and gave names to them—the sun, the moon, the stars, the wind. In time he assigned sex to them, and then various attributes, until they were completely personified. Thus, in Persia the blazing sun was adored as Ormuzd; in the bleak north the Norsemen called on Odin, the stormy; in Gaul and Britain pillars were raised to the sun, altars to the moon." "At first, man was conscious only of physical inferiority, and thus his gods were his superiors in brute force alone; when his intellect grew, he felt how unequal it was to grasp the laws of Nature, and then the gods were treated as his superiors in wisdom and understanding. At last his moral consciousness awakened, and with it a consciousness of sin, then he raised his gods to an altitude of moral holiness and purity which he himself despaired to reach" [S. Baring-Gould]. Polytheism can lead its followers no further; here it leaves them without help, and its utter failure, even as a moral restraint, was felt by the best minds of the civilized world when Christ appeared.

Pomps [lit. "processions"].—The phrase "pomps of the devil" included anciently all heathen spectacles, public games, etc. A definition is thus given by Chrysostom: "The pomps of Satan are the theatre and games of the circus, together with the observation of days, and presages and omens."

Pontifex or Pontiff.—An order of heathen priests at Rome. Four pontifices, chosen from the patricians, were created by Numa, in A.U.C. 454 four more, chosen from the plebeians, were added. Sylla further increased the number to fifteen, and it afterwards became indefinite. The Pontifex Maximus was the head of the College of Pontiffs, and was a person of considerable power. The office of Pontifex Maximus was assumed by the Emperor Augustus, and was held by his successors, including the Christian emperors, till Gratian [A.D. 367-383]. The term "pontiff," as applied to Christian bishops, is borrowed from this source.

Pontificale.—A book of rites which can only be performed by a bishop [pontiff]; e.g. the coronation of kings, the ordination of priests and deacons, and confirmation.

Poole, MATTHEW, a Nonconformist writer, was born at York in 1624, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He became Presbyterian minister of St. Michael-le-Quernes, London, in 1648; but lost his living in 1662 for his Nonconformity. He devoted himself to Biblical studies and writing, and died at Amsterdam in 1679.

His chief works are Synopsis Bibliorum Criticorum, published in 1669, which has gone through many editions; The Blasphemer slain by the Sword of the Spirit, directed against John Biddle, the Socinian [1664]; A Model

St. Clare died in 1253 Cardinal Cajetan, with the approval of Pope IV., drew up a fresh rule; some preferred that of St. Francis, which divided into the "Urbanites" "Clares." The first monastery of the order was founded in 1293, outside Aldgate, and gave its name to the "Minorites." There were formerly a great number in France, disappeared at the Revolution, and six remain. The greatest numbers are in Austria. There are five convents in England and six in Ireland.

Poor, THE.—Although Christianity developed the care of the rich, the poor, yet a provision for their support existed among the primitives and was adopted as a matter of policy. Among the Athenians, the poor were maintained in battle, and the poor who were slain, were maintained by the State. There were also in Greece, called eranes, somewhat on the principle of friendly societies. In the early days of the Agrarian and Licinian laws against the unfair distribution of land amongst her citizens. Later, Christianity began to bear upon the custom of parents exposing their children whom they had no means to maintain. The Church took them under her protection, and provided for them by the erection of orphan asylums. Constantine, in 315-21, made the support of these asylums a duty of the State, and the Council of Nice in 325, in the foundation of founding hospitals [529-534], again, made laws and founded houses of mercy, and thus Christianity began to alleviate the great evil which was powerless to eradicate. Till the fifth century, and another besides several others in different parts of Europe individuals and others. Several are spoken of in I hospital in Rome was founded in the fourth century. Legacies to the poor were permitted in 321.

From the Middle Ages poor people, including the working classes, who looked to the Church for maintenance, and the king in England received a portion of the land for the support of their families. The Church, through her abbey and monasteries, was the almoner of the world, and to the poor and the charities of the city of London were referred through the Church.

From early times there were laws for the suppression of vagrancy, and the poor was compelled to provide for himself.

In the reign of Richard II. provision was made for the provision of the poor; Henry VIII. wished to collect alms in a parish for this purpose. His suppression of the monasteries had been a cruel blow to the aged and infirm, and had been relieved largely by the monasteries. It was in Queen Elizabeth's year 1601, that the enactment of provision for the poor took the shape of our present Poor Law. It decreed that every inhabitant of a parish should be taxed for the relief of the poor, and that three or four householders in a parish, together with the churchwardens, should be made overseers of the poor, to give relief to the aged, work to the idle, and to apprentice the orphan. In the reign of George I. the Poor Law was introduced, and in 1782 an Act, called the Poor Law Amendment Act, introduced workhouse unions, and a relaxation in the treatment of the poor, and a system of out-door relief in place of the workhouse system.

It became in time a great relief to the allowance made to the poor on the birth of each child, and the system in which every labourer had a claim on the parish, and in which every labourer's commission was appointed to the matter, and they recommended the abolition of out-door relief; and the authority to control the administration of the better management of the poor, and the classification of the poor. A Bill for carrying out the Poor Law Amendment Act was passed in 1834. Paid Commissioners were appointed to dispense the Poor Law, and the direction of an unpaid Board of Poor Law Commissioners. In three years the operation of the Poor Law Amendment Act, the expenditure by one of the Commissioners was exhibited on a public board, with a President of the Poor Law, and one of the ministers of the Poor Law, and it has been impossible to withdraw out-door relief in the case of the sick and aged, but it is no longer given to the able-bodied as a supplement to low wages. Fifty-four public auditors examine the expenditure, and one or more district medical officers are attached to each union to attend on the sick poor.

Scotland and Ireland have similar, though separate, legislations as regards the poor. In Scotland out-door relief is the rule. In Ireland, where there was no poor-law till 1838, relief is administered almost entirely in the workhouse.

Christianity has been greatly instrumental in the reduction of pauperism. Mr. C. L. Brace thus writes in Gesta Christi, p. 403:—

"It is almost a common-place to say that all the varied and blessed institutions of charity throughout Christendom, all the asylums, hospitals, and reformatories, the provisions for the lame, blind, and deaf, for the idiot and insane, for the sick of every possible disease, for the widow and orphan and homeless, for the aged and infirm, are only blossoms and fruit of the life and teachings and death of the great Benefactor." And again [p. 417]:—

"The Christian, other things being equal, is less likely to be very poor, and a pauper he cannot easily be—that is, he cannot have that spirit of dependence, idleness, and dishonesty, which are the essentials of pauperism. . . . It is not claimed that religion alone in future ages can remove pauperism from the world, but the Christian belief will tend to a more just distribution of property; it will promote temperance and good morals; it will stimulate co-operation between labourers, and between labour and capital; it will encourage many forms of insurance, and above all elevate and train the character, so that the human being, though unfortunate, cannot be degraded, and thus, under the influence of Christ on the world, the labouring classes will be less likely to fall into extreme poverty, and, if they do, will be more readily assisted, or will not sink morally."

Popes.—This word is derived from the Latin papa, a childish or endearing word for father. In the days of the early Church it was undoubtedly applied to all the clergy, as it is in the Greek Church to this day. In the Western Church it was soon restricted to bishops, and then to those only who held important Sees, such as Alexandria, Carthage, and Rome. It was Gregory VII. who first ordained that the Bishop of Rome, and he only, could bear the title. We have already fully entered into the history of the growth of the Papal power. [PAPAL POWER.] The following is a list of the Popes, taken from Milner's End of Controversy, a standard Roman Catholic work. Notices of the principal Popes will be found under their respective names. The references in brackets opposite some names are reminders of events which occurred during their pontificates. Porphyry [233-304] was a native of Syria. His original name was Melech [Heb. for "king"], and his preceptor, Longinus, afterwards named him Porphyrius [i.e. "empurpled"], because purple was the royal colour. He was for a while a pupil of Origen, then of Longinus, then of Plotinus. He wrote fifteen books against Christianity, which were unhappily destroyed a century later by order of Theodosius the Emperor. We say unhappily, because it is impossible but that, if we had them, they would furnish much information on doubtful points respecting the early Church. His life of Pythagorus is extant, and some other books, one of which was

Royal had become an abominable antagonists of Arnauld. His were a reproof to the Jesuits, and yet framed the "Five Propositions" concerning the mystery of Divine Grace, which were said to be contained in the book Augustinus. Arnauld denied teaching was to be found in the Parisian doctors appointed to the matter declared that they were, were condemned as heretical by a Papal Bull. [JANSENISTS.] Mother, Anne of Austria, urged decreed the fall of Port Royal; but it was hindered for a so-called miracle performed on the Perrier, the niece of Pascal, a thorn said to be preserved from the crown: this relic was exposed at Port Royal in Lent, 1656, and the young girl, who was suffering with a fearful sore eye, on touching the sore with the relic was instantaneously cured. This miracle secured a special mark of Divine Grace to the monastery, and Anne of Austria carried out her plan, and so once more Port Royal was spared. The story of the Holy Thorn, which was held by Arnauld, Le Maître, and others, and last embodied it in his Provincial Letters, it will be found in English in Port Royal, by Madame von Schimmelfennig. But the brief respite came to an end with the death of Mazarin and the assumption of power by Louis XIV. in person, in 1660. Louis was a friend of the Jesuits and a hater of Jansenism. He at once ordered the closing of Port Royal, and decreed the demolition of Port Royal and Les Granges alike by the formula condemning the Jansenists. This they refused to do, and the nuns were dispersed, and the recluses banished from their valley. Port Royal, now quite old, quitted Port Royal des Champs and went to Paris, where the monastery guarded by soldiers and here she and many of her Sisters. Sœur Flavie, one of the remaining, was a traitor to her society: she betrayed the Jansenist heresies, as she called them, and the hope of being made Abbess, was secured from the Archbishop of Paris, and the imprisonment of many of her Order, and the command to subscribe to the propositions. This was again refused. Sœur Flavie, another sister became a traitor, and procured a separation of the community from that at Versailles. Those who had been imprisoned were sent to Port Royal des Champs, and decreed the Sacraments of the Church. Yet the dissolution of the nunnery was the intervention of Anne of Bourbignon, sister of Longueville, and sister of the Duke of Orléans. She, after a life of dissipation, and the ranks of the ladies of Port Royal, Paris, and addressed herself to

Pope Clement IX. on behalf of the persecuted Order. He made terms of peace with them, and once more allowed Arnauld and his associates to recruit their monastery, open their schools, and receive back the scattered recluses. But the doom of the stronghold of Jansenism was fixed. Cardinal de Noailles, one of its bitterest enemies, had become Archbishop of Paris, and he persuaded Clement XI., in 1707, to issue the Bull, Unigenitus, requiring the nuns of Port Royal to subscribe it; this they declined to do, except with certain restrictions, and their fate was sealed. De Noailles obtained an order for the suppression of the convent, and the nuns were finally dispersed in 1709 by armed police, and left to die without priestly absolution or Christian burial. Not content with this, a royal order, in 1710, caused the demolition of the monastery and the church; and nothing now remains of this once celebrated place but the ruins of a Gothic arch.

Positivism.—Positivism consists essentially of a Philosophy and a Polity, and to these may be added a Religion. It was originated by Auguste Comte [b. 1797, d. 1857], who set forth his ideas in some fifteen volumes. The books are rather verbose, and the difficulties connected with his system are met with the easy assurance, or "thereforeism," so often found in French philosophical and theological writers.

The name "Positivism" was chosen by Comte as implying reality and usefulness as well as certainty and precision, since he teaches that we have nothing whatever to do with anything which cannot be positively demonstrated. The existence of God, and the belief in a future state, are thus practically excluded from his system.

Positivism as a Philosophy.—"Each branch of our knowledge," says Comte, "passes successively through three different theoretical conditions—the theological or fictitious (or supernatural), the metaphysical or abstract, and the scientific or positive." These conditions are radically opposed to one another, and hence entire freedom from theological belief is necessary before the positive state can be perfectly attained. "In the theological state, the human mind, seeking the essential nature of beings, the first and final causes (the origin and purpose) of all effects—in short, absolute knowledge—supposes all phenomena to be produced by the immediate action of supernatural beings The theological system arrived at the highest perfection of which it is capable when it substituted the providential action of a single Being for the varied operations of the numerous divinities which had been before imagined." In other words, it began with Polytheism and advanced to Monotheism.

"In the metaphysical state, which is only a modification of the first, the mind supposes, instead of supernatural beings, abstract forces, veritable entities (that is, personified abstractions) inherent in all beings, and capable of producing all phenomena. What is called the explanation of phenomena is, in this stage, a mere reference of each to its proper entity In the last stage of the metaphysical system, men substitute one great entity (Nature) as the cause of all phenomena instead of the multitude of entities at first supposed."

"In the final, the positive, state the mind has given over the vain search after absolute notions, the origin and destination of the universe and the causes of phenomena, and applies itself to their laws; that is, their invariable relations of succession and resemblance. Reasoning and observation, duly combined, are the means of this knowledge. What is now understood, when we speak of an explanation of facts, is simply the establishment of a connection between single phenomena and some general facts, the number of which continually diminish with the progress of science. . . . The ultimate perfection of the positive system would be (if such perfection could be hoped for) to represent all phenomena as particular aspects of a single general fact, such as gravitation, for instance. . . . The point of departure of the individual and of the race being the same, the phases of the mind of a man correspond to the epochs of the mind of the race. . . . Each of us is aware that he was a theologian in his childhood, a metaphysician in his youth, and a natural philosopher in his manhood." [Comte's Positive Philosophy, translated by H. Martineau.]

"The principle of theology is to explain everything by supernatural wills. That principle can never be set aside until we acknowledge the search for causes to be beyond our reach, and limit ourselves to the knowledge of laws." "The true positive spirit consists . . . in a word, in studying the how, instead of the why," of phenomena. [General View of Positivism, translated by H. Bridges.]

The ultimate aim and end of all knowledge is, according to Comte, the progressive well-being of Humanity; hence he places Sociology at the head of all the sciences,—that to which they lead up. The pursuit of a science into regions where it has no practical bearings, direct or indirect, he condemns as useless, and a departure from positive principles, whilst he brands the speculations themselves as "metaphysical," as a mere return to an exploded philosophical system.

Comte arranges the sciences in six primary divisions, according to the increasing complexity of their phenomena. Mathematics, being the most simple, comes first; and then follow astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology. Each passes through the three stages, theological, metaphysical, positive, before the one succeeding it. Sociology has not yet become positive, as theological metaphysical modes of thought still remain in progress. Comte has also constructed his philosophy of history as set forth in a connected view of universal history. He argues that human activity passes successively through the stages of offensive warfare, defensive warfare, and industry. He shows the respective connection of these stages with the preponderance of the theological, metaphysical, or the positive principle. It reproduces in a systematic division of history into ancient, modern, and modern.

The subjective principle of Positivism is the subordination of the intellect to the objective basis is the external order as revealed by science. The first intellect is to discover the laws of the external world—"the immutable laws of the external world"—and then to regulate feelings by controlling them, with the purpose of regulating action. It must be systematised before feelings are put before actions, though it is quite true that feeling and activity have much to do with any practical step that is taken. In other words, the intellect is subordinate to affection, which is the system is the preponderance of affection needed to direct and control it. It deals with the external order—the laws of the various sciences—the laws of sociology—but only in the midst of the affections.

When, next, Positivism is applied to polity, its weakness becomes apparent. The Positivist motto is "love, or the means for carrying out ideas are Utopian, and no sufficient means for carrying out any one of the three is laid down for generating society. Comte looks for three sources—to philosophers, to the intellectual element, to the active element, as supplying the active element, as bringing the element of feeling. The third element we may be content to keep in due subordination to the intellectual and practical fact. Politics are to be subordinate to the Positivist, the object to make our sympathetic instincts moderate as far as possible over our instincts; social feelings over personal feelings. Between personal feeling and social feelings come the higher affections, and hence these are valued as a step towards the development of social feelings, since the first principle of morality for others is the highest happiness in the Positive system, is the great infirmity of our natural education, which is to be strictly to develop the social feeling.

as a Religion.—Positive Religion, on of Humanity, as Comte calls it, nvention. Having dismissed, as the belief in God and the in- ging for immortality, some central wanted towards which Feeling, l Activity could alike converge, s found in the great conception y—the abstract idea of mankind , the present, and the future. [General

y Humanity, the conception of entirely superseded." This differs eism, since the Great Being of Positivism submits to the laws of the external world instead of originating them. [PAN- THEISM.] This idea is to be illustrated by the organisation of festivals at regular intervals setting forth the various aspects of Humanity: the Nation, the Town, the Domestic Relations, Polytheism, Monotheism, etc., will have their festival days; in fact, there is to be a "Positivist Calendar." On the last day of the year there is to be a commemoration of the dead and of their services.

Throughout his system, Comte assigns to Woman a peculiar and exalted position. He seems to find the answer to Solomon's question, "Who can find a virtuous woman?" in the great majority of women. Woman's mission is, he says, in one word, Love; they are charged with the education of Sympathy, the source of human unity. As mothers and wives it is their office to conduct the moral education of Humanity. In return for these benefits women are to enjoy immunity from out-door and other toilsome labour, and besides they are to be the objects of Worship, publicly and privately, as the first permanent step towards the Worship of Humanity. Man will, in the days when Positivism prevails, kneel to Woman, and to Woman alone; the source of his reverential feelings being a clear appreciation of benefits received, and a spirit of deep thankfulness for them. To her, as the concrete form of the abstract idea of Humanity, Prayer—i.e. the outpouring of men's nobler feelings—is to be addressed daily. If a suitable living object of devotion does not present itself, a dead wife or mother may be selected, or even some historical personage, so long as she once really lived. For women themselves, however, Comte does not consider himself competent to suggest an object of devotion.

We have seen that love is said to be the principle of Positivism; it is to amount to an abnegation of self; the motto on the Positive flag is to be "Vivre pour autrui," Live for Others; and the great moral principle itself Comte called Altruism: hence "to love Humanity may be truly said to constitute the whole duty of man." And then, after having "lived as far as it is possible for others, both in public and private, and having given a charm and sacredness to our temporary life, we shall at last be forever incorporated with the Supreme Being [Humanity], of whose life all noble natures are necessarily partakers." [General View—condensed.]

If we look for the sources of this novel religion, we are not much assisted by Comte's own life. He seems to have been an eccentric genius, with one of those bitter despotic tempers which led him to quarrel with every one! He was separated from his wife, and lived on intimate terms with a married woman, Clotilde de Vaux, notwithstanding the strict morality of his system. We must rather turn for an explanation to what he calls "Catholicism," by which he means sometimes Christianity, sometimes modern Romanism; and then we cannot but be struck with the singular imitation of Christianity and the Christian Church which Positivism presents. Thus, for the Positive principle of love, "live for others," we have the Gospel grace of love as "the fulfilling of the Law," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," with the Christian rule of self-denial. For the abstract idea of Humanity, we have the Incarnate Son of God, the Second Adam, and the Church of many members, His Mystical Body. For the worship of woman, extended to women generally in imitation of Medieval Chivalry, and perhaps not without reference to the goddess of Reason of the French Revolution, we have the Romanist cultus of the Virgin. The Madonnas of art had likewise their influence, for the Positivist flag has for its device a young woman with a child in her arms. For the festivals and commemorations we have the Christian Seasons and the roll of Saints. The leading principle and the form of the Religion of Humanity are thus obviously borrowed from Catholic Christianity.

Positivism is not on the increase, in this country, at any rate. It numbers amongst its adherents some men of high ability and many of good moral character. But a system that asserts that there is no sense of, or feeling after, a God in our nature, which does not acknowledge a sense of sin or guilt as we understand it, nor an instinctive longing for, or expectation of, immortality in man, gives us little ground for hope that the exalted love and the strict morality which it professes would bear fruit in practice if it were freed from the pressure of surrounding Christian opinion. It seems, by its negations, rather to be the philosophy of those who are absorbed in the sense of life, and to whom this world is the whole of existence. Taking Positivism at its own estimate, it would appear to be easier to live as a consistent Christian than as a moderately good Positivist; and certainly the promise of eternal life is more attractive than, at the best, the possibility of an idle commemoration after incorporation into the Supreme Being of Humanity.

Post-Communion.—The part of the Communion Service following the reception, beginning with the Lord's Prayer.

Postils.—Sermons or homilies. They followed the reading of the Gospel, whence the name [post illa—i.e. evangelica].

Postures.—The bodily attitudes assumed in the various parts of Divine Worship. Reason, Scripture, and universal consent testify that all postures are not equally appropriate in that worship and in its different departments. Kneeling and prostration seem peculiarly expressive of penitence; bowing, of deep veneration; standing and thanksgiving. Thus, as a general rule the Church enjoins kneeling in prayer and prayer; standing in praise, the recitation of the Creed, and in the exhortation to the Eucharist, and allows sitting during the reading of Scripture and the delivery of the Eucharist. In Scotland, however, they sit, and in the East they sit or stand, during the prayers.

Potamo, Bishop of Heraclea, imprisoned for his faith in the Maximian persecution. He was present at the Council of Constantinople, and was strongly opposed to the Arians. He also accompanied St. Athanasius to the Council of Tyre [335]. An Arian Bishop Gregory seized the See of Heraclea in 342, Potamo was so tormented that he died.

Potter, CHRISTOPHER, D.D. [d. 1646], Dean of Worcester from 1621 to 1646. He wrote, Warrant of Liberty charged on all such Romanists as do that Protestantism destroys Salvation, an answer to Edward Knott's Charity taken, who retaliated in Merry and Charity maintained by Catholics.

Potter, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury of a lineal descendant of Wakefield [d. 1747]. He was educated at Oxford when only twenty-three years old; his book on Greek Antiquities, which in recent times has been a standard work though it is now quite superseded, in 1747 he took Holy Orders, and for some time his studies were exclusively profane. Archbishop Tenison made him his Chaplain and gave him the living of Great Malvern in Kent. He was also Chaplain to Anne, and Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford. He became Archbishop in 1747.

Power of the Keys. [Error or.]

Præmunire [corrupted from procurare].—A term used in a writ passed in the reign of Edward III. Its primary object was to curtail the Pope's authority, and a writ was issued that no one, and particularly no man, should appeal to the Pope against the authority of the sovereign, or on matters relating to his jurisdiction. It also declared that the Pope had no right to dispose of ecclesiastical preferments in England. This writ became a Statute of Præmunire in the reign of Edward III., and the penalty for the offence was at first imprisonment for life, confiscation of lands and goods, and forfeiture of the right of election. Since that time the name has been applied to other statutes, all relating to the king's authority, but differing as to the offences forbidden.

Pragmatic Sanction.—A name applied to ordinances relating to the Church.

State, more particularly those by the Kings of France. An of this nature, issued in 1268, at cathedral churches should have electing their own prelates; that the selling of benefices should be that no money should be exacted out of Rome but with the consent of the sovereign, and that the liberties of ecclesiastics by former kings respected. The most famous Pragmatic was one granted by Charles 38, and confirmed by the Parliament in the following year. Its to restore the primitive custom of election of prelates by the people instead of the king, and it also regulated the excommunication, appeals, and abolished expectative graces, and number of cardinals. This was the cause to numerous controversies, and finally revoked by Francis I. in 1516.

Praxeas.—A heretic, of whom nothing is except that at the end of the second century he came to Rome from Asia (where he fled imprisonment), and taught of Montanus. Thence he went to where he was convinced of his errors, and a recantation, but soon relapsed. Praxeas was the first of the heresies who maintained the Catholic faith that the Son and Man. By denying the personality of the Son and of the Father he inferred that the Father was crucified and suffered, and therefore is identified with the Patristians; but he held that he belonged to that sect, saying the Father only sympathised with him and did not suffer in Him. The Praxeas are very similar to those of the Gnostics. They soon died out.

Prayer.—In its wider meaning, and as often in Holy Scripture, prayer is not only petition to God for ourselves or for others, but also confession of sin, giving for mercies received, and praise and adoration of God for His love and glory, to which last the term 'adoration' is properly applied. These various meanings of prayer are abundantly illustrated in the Bible, the great book of inspired literature, and private devotion. Thus, in the first of the Psalms we sometimes find one of these elements of prayer, and this may remind us that the line we often draw between prayer and adoration is an artificial one. In our Old Testament, indeed, in the prayers of the Church generally, petition predominates over worship or adoration, but in the more rhetorical prayers of the Church adoration holds an important place. Man naturally believes the idea of prayer to be intuitive. Man naturally turns to God in prayer. The Psalmist was but uttering a universal truth when he said, "O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come" [Ps. lxxv. 2]. Nor is this idea of prayer confined to those who know one God. In various ways heathens appeal to their gods; they hardly enter upon any event in their lives without first of all approaching, in some form of prayer, the powers they think able to help them. This is a matter of history, as well as of observation by missionaries now. We find prayer made to God throughout Holy Scripture, from beginning to end, accepted by Him, and answered by Him. Here and there, as in the Psalms, there are declarations as to the kind of prayer to which God will hearken, until at last, in the New Testament, Christ was plainly set forth as the medium through whom it is to be offered, and the Holy Spirit was made known as co-operating with the human spirit in its utterance. Christians pray as members of Christ; God hears and answers our prayers only because we are members of His beloved Son. The duty of prayer is inculcated, not only by the example of the Old Testament saints, but also directly by our Lord and his Apostles [Matt. vi. 5-13, xviii. 19, 20; Luke xviii. 1-14; John xiv. 13, 14; xvi. 24, Rom. viii. 26; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Ephes. vi. 18, 19; Philipp. iv. 6; 1 Thess. v. 17; Jas. i. 5, v. 13-18].

Remembering, then, the manifoldness of prayer, some points connected with it in its aspects of petition for ourselves, or of intercession for others, require examination. We must first clearly recognise that God puts prayer before us as necessary if we would gain our ends. There is a signal instance of this, and of the store which God sets by His people's prayers, when our Lord bade His disciples "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that He will send forth labourers into His harvest" [Matt. ix. 38]. The disciples were bidden to ask God to do His own work, and thus to co-operate with Him in His labour of love. But this is only a sample of all prayer. God is ever seeking the salvation and well-being of His creatures, and yet He requires them to ask Him for those very things of which He knows they stand in the direst need. How there can be a place for petition when God foresees everything, is the mystery of prayer; but there is likewise the mystery of our free-will, and the one is the necessary complement of the other. If we are free to rule or misrule our lives and conduct, our very nature leads us to prayer in our perplexities and distresses. If we are free to wander, we must appeal to a guide. This may be an intellectual difficulty, but it is one involved in the mystery of God, and in the mystery of our own being.

of prayer ages before God directly, and in such a way that we can

been raised as to prayer and its efficacy. [1] It has been said that prayer is merely a superstitious custom, handed on from generation to generation in civilised countries; that it is a human invention altogether. But, unlike other superstitions, which have crumbled away in the light of truth and of modern discovery, prayer still holds its ground. In spite of all that is alleged as to its uselessness, men of the acutest intellect, as well as uncultured men, still pray, and still believe in the power of prayer. Besides this, we cannot pass over the fact already mentioned, that prayer is an intuitive idea with man, and is not due to education—that it fulfils a universal need of human nature. [2] It is said that prayer is unreasonable, because request is made for things contrary to the immutable laws of Nature. It is needful to state this objection to prayer plainly. The laws of nature are merely statements of the orderly condition of things in nature, a summary of what has been found by competent observers. The order is so perfect that we do not look for any deviation from it. And in the spiritual world, as far as we know it, we have every reason to believe that law likewise reigns, or, to speak more correctly, that the most perfect order prevails. Thus we must believe that every thought of our hearts is the result of some previous combination of ideas, either existing there already or introduced from without. Thoughts do not come into our minds by chance. Such being what we understand by law, we can suppose that prayer may be answered, or apparently answered, in two ways. Thus, fine weather may be prayed for, and many natural laws acting together may bring it about in the ordinary course of things, to all appearance as a direct answer to the prayer; or, on the other hand, natural causes not sufficing to cause fine weather, God may see fit to bring about the result prayed for by suspending or controlling some of the laws of nature. It is to the latter of these answers to prayer that objection is made. Again, prayer may be made for some spiritual blessing, and the blessing may come, either from ordinary causes, i.e. as a result of the religious circumstances in which God has placed us, or He may put a fresh thought into our minds, or change the intensity of some feelings already there, and thus bring the blessing prayed for. It is the latter case to which objection is made. Objectors regard those answers to prayer for temporal or spiritual blessings which come in the ordinary course of natural laws as the only possible ones; they look upon them as mere coincidences, and they wholly deny the possibility of answers of the latter kind, because they are contrary to unchangeable laws—in short, because they are miraculous, and miracles are incredible. [The question of the credibility of miracles is discussed in the articles MIRACLES and RESURRECTION, and reference may be made to the article on NATURAL LAW.] there is also a class of theologians who are disposed to deny that miraculous answers to prayer are vouchsafed; one of them recently expressed his opinion as follows: “To the best of my understanding, it is as well and reasonably to ask God—just do for a daily sufficiency in the Prayer—to bless and preserve the fruits of the earth, leaving the immediate production to the ordinary workings of His all-wise and then, after doing our duty in the world, to trust that, in spite of appearances, perfect wisdom, perfect love, is working for the best.” In all troubles, temporal or spiritual, we do well to put them up to God and ask for His guidance to do so as to mitigate or relieving them, and take to heart the many moral lessons which are inculcated. This prayer, with the understanding, I deem to be our reasonable petition to the Almighty; while, according to the light and knowledge of God’s word and salutary law of ‘reaping what we sow’ we deem it unreasonable to ask Him to suspend this law for our special or national benefit.” This writer would deem it unreasonable to be asked to pray against inundations of the Thames in London, or would consider the Thames Embankment authorities the proper source of help. If he would say, the seasons lately have been unfavourable for agriculture: therefore, for this is to alter our system, reaping what we sow. And he goes on, “Why I strike special petitions to the Almighty to intercede directly in certain things when they are painful, is because we practically charge God with directly and sending such visitations, when, as we are but reaping what we or others culpably or ignorantly sow. . . . I do not say that God cannot so administer His law, moral and physical, as to give us what we ask. I simply say to the best of our understanding, so far as we can learn from revelation and experience, God does not work signs and wonders that we can believe.” Now, as nearly the whole of our needs and adversities can be traced to our culpable or ignorant sowing of ourselves and others, prayer, according to this view, must be limited to petitions for patience and guidance as to how we can best help ourselves. Unquestionably these are right subjects of prayer, since all real prayer is always accompanied by work on our part; but it is impossible to accept them as the whole, or even the most important, part of prayer, without ignoring what is said in Holy Scripture. Prayer is there presented to us as the remedy for our sins and their effects, and the only conditions upon our petitions are, that they be according to God’s will, and the out-

 ing was restricted to bishops and priests; but deacons, about the fourth century, regained the right. The history of preaching in the ancient Christian Church is one of the most interesting branches of ecclesiastical annals. Basil of Cæsarea, St.

 John Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, were among the most famous preachers of the Greek Church. In the Latin, Jerome and Augustine were probably the greatest.
 Such records as we have of the great preachers of ancient times show that they differed much in pulpit action, but the greater part seem to have used very moderate and sober gesture. They delivered their sermons extempore, while there were notaries who took down what they said. Probably an hour was about the usual length. Sermons were generally both uttered and heard standing, the preacher preceding his sermon with "Peace be with you," to which the assembly responded
 "Amen," and later, "And with thy Spirit."
 The Middle Ages produced great preachers like Bernard, Bonaventura, Anselm; but the development of the Scholastic philosophy was not favourable to the development of homiletical power. The Mendicant or Preaching Friars wrought a revolution in this matter by the vigour and homely common-sense with which they replaced the subtleties of their predecessors. The greatest preacher of mediæval times—the most like, it has been said, of all Christian preachers to the ancient prophets—was Savonarola. But, unfortunately, the ignorance of the clergy, and the neglect into which the study of the Scriptures had fallen, became a fatal drawback; and it was the first great work of the Reformation to restore preaching to its place of dignity as a means of grace. The avidity of the common people to read Scripture and hear it expounded was wonderful, and the result was that the "unpreaching prelates," whose pulpits, as Latimer expressed it, had been "bells without clappers" for many long years, were obliged to set up regular preaching again. The same variation which marked the early preachers characterised the great homilists of the Reformation. Thus, it was said, the preaching of Knox was like a thunderstorm; Calvin resembled a whole day's set rain, Beza was a shower of the softest dew. Latimer, in a coarse frieze gown, trudged afoot, and instructed the people in rustic style; while the courtly Ridley, in satin and fur, taught the same principles in his cathedral.

Since the Reformation the Roman Church has produced no famous preachers in England; but Bourdaloue, Massillon, and Bossuet, in France, were probably never surpassed.
 The English preachers of the same period have won themselves a deathless name:
 Jeremy Taylor, South, Baxter, Owen, Calamy, Wesley, and Whitefield, in the eighteenth century, roused England from the torpor into which she had fallen.

It is difficult to weigh accurately the estimate in which popular preaching is held at the present time. On the one hand it is certainly the fact that never probably were preachers who drew larger audiences than some in all denominations who could be mentioned at the present day. On the other it must be confessed that one hears "the sermon" often mentioned contemptuously, and the wish expressed that it might be omitted. The most powerful of living statesmen has expressed his conviction that the preaching power of the Church of England was never so great as it is at the present moment. But it is unpleasant to read advertisements in the Clerical newspapers of "manuscript sermons" at a cheap rate, which imitate handwriting so well that they cannot be detected in the gallery! This we may be sure of, that if preachers will take pains and have the ability to make their sermons worth hearing, they will not lack hearers, simply for the reason that the spirit of inquiry is abroad eager and keen. The writer of these lines has had a large experience of poor as well as rich audiences; and no one knows better, that the average agricultural labourer is one of the ablest of critics, knows a good sermon, and knows a bad one; no man better. A very clever essay by Mr. Mahaffy [Macmillan, 1882] thus analyses the causes of the decay of modern preaching:—

1. Historical Causes:

- Loss of novelty.
- Increase of education.
- Quietness of modern life.

II. Social Causes:

- Need of social uniformity.*
- Absence of debate.
- Friendly life of the clergy.

* The preacher is required, on fixed and very frequent occasions, however indisposed or empty he may feel as regards teaching, to ascend a narrow pulpit, where he has no power of movement or action. Indeed, all action more violent than that of speaking very loud, or thumping the cushion, is prohibited, and even these symptoms of energy have come to be considered excessive and ill-bred. He is obliged to find a text of Scripture from which to draw his lessons, even though there be none exactly appropriate and though he be forced to employ many quibbles and subtleties to graft on his discourse to the text. He is not to speak too loud or too low; he must not be too long or too short; if the former, he offends the worldly and idle, who only come to church from habit, and desire to escape as soon as may be convenient; if the latter, he annoys the serious and respectable people, who think that such brevity reflects on the importance of his subject. If he employs anecdotes and descends to particulars, in order to give colour to his sermon, he is thought familiar; if he keeps to dogma only, he is thought dry. In fact, every sort of departure from a fixed norm, a fixed way of speaking, a fixed way of thinking, is resented by some section of the congregation. Above all, to be amusing is a great crime. The shadow of Puritanism still hangs over our churches, and if, a generation ago, all ornament in churches was thought to savour of worldliness, or of all false doctrine, so all levity, as it is called, is considered as excluded by the solemnity of the subject. And yet men pleading for life and death, for

III. and IV. Personal Causes:

- Want of ability.
- Want of piety.
- Want of general culture.
- Want of special training in rhetoric and in theology.

V. Defective Types:

- The logical extreme.
- The emotional extreme.
- The orthodox extreme.
- The heterodox extreme.

And this is followed by an able and at chapter suggesting remedies.

The Church of England Liturgy, so the rubric goes, has made but scant provisions for preaching. The only place a sermon is provided for in the Book is in the Communion Service. Finding, therefore, it has been said, an essential part of that service, while merely an adjunct to Evening Prayer. The rubric giving directions for the service allows, as a substitute, "one of the lessons already set forth, or hereafter to be set forth by authority." But as we have seen, practically the Church has recognised the great value of this ordinance, and the few churches probably where there are not at least two sermons a week. Queries and answers point are always found in Bishops' Visitation returns.

Preaching Crosses.—Crosses in the highway or places of public resort, which the friars and others were accustomed to preach. St. Paul's Cross was one of the most remarkable; it was there that Luther preached some of his famous sermons.

Pre-Adamites.—A name given to the supposed inhabitants of the earth before the creation of Adam; also to those who believe that such persons existed. The Pre-Adamite theory was first propounded in 1655, in a book by Isaac de la Peyrere, otherwise Pererius, a native of Bordeaux, and in the service of the Prince of Condé. He says great issues of poverty and wealth, for great struggles which involve the weak and the strong, do not disdain to attract and to draw an audience by an appeal to that peculiar quality, the faculty of laughter. There is no man in the world, speaking on the subject of his heart, and most vital to those he addresses, who avoids this great help to persuasion, the preacher. To him, while wit is whollymissible, even humour is only allowed in the absence of bitterness and sarcasm—the very forms are really most unsuitable to his sacred office. There is, moreover, a large section of the Church who will not tolerate any variety of subject, and think that the preacher has but one duty to bring, and that so paramount in importance that every moment not devoted to it is lost or wasted, and they require him to repeat this message every Sunday of his life."

God created men and women on the earth; and that long after Adam and Eve to be His own, the ancestors of the Jewish race intended to write the history of the world therefore says little of the first man, or of his history; for the records in Genesis are only those of the Jews, and have no reference to other races living on the earth. It is given to the Jews only, and not to the Gentiles, so no sin could be imputed to them, according to St. Paul; therefore, which the author of the story of the Fall is natural evil. To prove that the Jews had recourse to the traditions of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and to the opinions of philosophers who imagined there had been a world in existence before that of Adam. He was apprehended by the Romans in Flanders, but released on the intercession of the Prince of the Netherlands. He reflected on his opinions. Modern theories, in the opinion of some, lay the ground for the revival of the theory. [EVOLUTION; MAN.]

[Lat. præbenda, "an allowance, originally the portion of food given to a monk at the table where they were wont to assemble. In course of time church revenues were divided between the laity and clergy, according to the number of benefices, but the term continued to be applied to the fixed income which the donor gave. The benefices were either præbendæ or præbendæ domicellares, the former held by a regular member of the church, and the latter, by a junior. They were of four degrees—majores, media, minores, and quarta. The holder of a benefice was called a præbendarius, and receives a salary in return for certain services.

—The leader of the choir in a church; usually in cathedrals and churches. The precentor may be a monk or a layman. In Scottish churches there is no organ, there is a precentor to lead the singing.

Prayers said by the priest and choir, as distinguished from those said by the priest alone. In the early church they were said daily at Matins, and also at Lauds and Vespers. The versicles and responses in the Creed and Lord's Prayer Book are a selection of these, and hence are sometimes called præbendæ.

Præbend. [ANTE-COMMUNION.]

Præconisation. [Lat. præconisare = præconare = "to proclaim publicly"].—The notice given by a bishop, signifying his approbation of any person to a high ecclesiastical dignity. The notice is sent to the Cardinal-Protector of the nation to which belongs the candidate submitted for approval, and a Bull of Preconisation is given to the latter, and also posted up at the doors of the church. The term is also used to denote a public proclamation in meetings of Convocation.

Predestination.—A word used to denote the eternal purpose of God, whereby He has preordained whatever comes to pass. The Seventeenth Article of the Church of England declares that "predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God," etc. But this doctrine has been the occasion of considerable disputes and controversies among divines. If, say they, God has foreordained some men to election, the converse must be true that He has foreordained some men to reprobation. It is impossible to reconcile the doctrine of reprobation with our ideas of the justice and goodness of God, as it makes God to be the author of sin, destroys moral distinction, and renders all our efforts useless. This doctrine had its origin in the attempts to define the relations between the human and the Divine will. It began with the discussions of Pelagius and St. Augustine. Pelagius held that a choice of salvation lay in man's will; Augustine, that at the Fall, man lost all freedom of choice, and was deprived of the exercise of his free will. [FREE-WILL.] But the first advocate of extreme Predestinarianism was Gottschalk, a monk of the ninth century, who was condemned at a Council of Mainz for heresy, and died during his imprisonment at the Monastery of Hautvilliers. Other Predestinarians came forward from time to time during the Middle Ages, but the doctrine reached its fullest development with the teaching of CALVIN [q.v.]. The doctrine of Predestination has been moderated within the present century, and in very few cases is the belief in double Predestination retained.

Preface to the Prayer Book.—The original preface [1549] was the Article now headed "Concerning the Service of the Church," and was almost entirely drawn from the reformed Breviary of Cardinal Quignon, published in 1535. The present one was prefixed in 1661, and was probably drawn up by Bishop Sanderson of Lincoln.

Prefaces, PROPER.—The special forms to precede the hymn Ter-Sanctus in the Holy Communion. Such prefaces are found in most ancient Liturgies, and have been variously styled Prefaces, Illations, Contestations, and Prayers of the Triumphal Hymn. In the early English Church there was probably one for every day which had a Collect; but the number was afterwards reduced to ten, of which the Reformers retained five, viz.: for Christmas Day, Ascension Day, Easter Day, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday. That for Ascension Day was probably written by Gregory the Great; those for Easter and Trinity Sundays are from the Sacramentary of Gelasius; while those for Christmas and Whitsunday were composed in 1549.

Prelacy.—The office or dignity of a prelate or bishop.

Prelate.—This term, which is now limited to the highest of the three orders of the ministry, was formerly applied to all clerics who bore rule over other clerics, or who were highly esteemed in the Church. So Archbishop Secker says, "Parish priests are Prælati;" and Latimer, "A Prelate is that man, whosoever he is, that has a flock to be taught by him."

Premonstrants. [NORBERT, ST.]

Pre-sanctified.—In the Roman Church it is customary to have no consecration on Good Friday, a portion of the bread consecrated on Maundy Thursday being reserved for the following day. In the Greek Church this principle is extended to every day of Lent, except Saturdays, Sundays, the Feast of the Annunciation, and Maundy Thursday. For the days on which the pre-sanctified or pre-consecrated elements are used, a special service, omitting the Act of Consecration, is appointed, called the Mass of the Pre-sanctified. The idea underlying this practice is that the Holy Eucharist, being essentially a feast, is unsuitable for fast days. The use of the Pre-sanctified was enjoined by the Council of Trullo [A.D. 680] on every day in Lent except the Sabbath Day, the Lord's Day, and the Annunciation. The Council of Laodicea had previously forbidden consecration during Lent, except upon the Sabbath Day and the Lord's Day.

Presbyter, Presbyterians.—The Greek word presbuteros, "senior" or "elder," is frequently used in the Greek translation of the Old Testament to signify a ruler or governor—one chosen not for his age, but for his merits and wisdom. In the Christian Church a presbyter or elder is one who is set apart to a certain office and authorised to discharge the several duties of that office and station in which he is placed. The office of the presbyter consisted in feeding the flock of God, and exhorting and convincing the gainsayers by sound doctrine, baptising, and celebrating the Eucharist, and leading the public prayers of the congregation. The body of Christians who call themselves PRESBYTERIANS hold that all the powers and rights of the Christian ministry, including ordination, are held and exercised by the single order of presbyters; that there is no order in the Church as established by Christ and His Apostles superior to that of presbyters; that all ministers, being ambassadors of Christ, are equal by their commission; that presbyter and bishop, though different words, are of the same import; and that prelacy was gradually established upon the primitive practice of making the moderator or speaker of the presbytery, a permanent officer. This is the point of controversy between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians by the following Scriptural arguments. They observe, that the Apostles planted churches by ordaining bishops and deacons in every city; that the ministers who in one verse are called bishops, in the next, perhaps, called presbyters; that nowhere read in the New Testament bishops, presbyters, and deacons in any church, and that therefore we must of necessity conclude "bishop" and "presbyter" two names for the same office. They take passage 1 Pet. v. 2-3, and say it is evident that the presbyters not only fed the flock of God, but governed it with episcopal power, and that Peter himself as a church officer nothing more than a presbyter or elder. Heb. xiii. 7-17 and 1 Thess. v. 12 the bishops are spoken of as discharging various duties which it would be impossible for any man to perform for more than one congregation; they were to be such as all the people we know, esteem, and love, they could not have diocesan bishops, whom ordinarily the greater part of their flock never hear nor see. Again, in James v. 14, the elders whom the Apostle James desires the sick to call for the highest permanent order of minister is evident that those elders cannot have diocesan bishops, otherwise the sick would have been often without the reach of the remedy proposed for them. From Acts xx. 17, etc., where St. Paul sends Miletus to Ephesus to call the elders of the Church, the Presbyterians argue that if there was in the city of Ephesus a plurality of pastors of equal authority without any superior pastor or bishop over them, for the Apostle directs his discourse to them all in common and gives them equal power over the flock. They argue, therefore, that Paul in the Church of Ephesus, which he had planted, no other successors to himself—presbyter-bishops, or Presbyterian ministers—and that he did not devolve his power upon any prelate. Timothy, whom the Episcopalians allege to have been the first Bishop of Ephesus, was present when this settlement was made [Acts xx. 5]; and had he been their bishop, it is not to be supposed that the Apostle would have devolved the episcopal power upon the presbyters upon his face; for if ever there were a reason than another for pointing out the duty of a supposed bishop to his diocese and his presbyters' duty to him, it would have been that Timothy resided at Ephesus, and was by the Apostle invested with authority to ordain and rebuke presbyters, are facts which both parties are agreed. What was his office in that city? To erian replies that his power was that of episcopatus, 2 Tim. iv. 5, and not of a fixed

It will thus be seen that they identify the office of bishop with that of presbyter, and consider the presbyterate to be the highest office in the Church, every faithful minister being successor to the Apostles in the thing in which they were to have any share.

Modern Presbyterian theory of Church government dates from the Reformation. It was earnestly taught that all Christians are equal to God. Even had he been desirous of adopting an Episcopal form of government, the Reformation took on the path so different from that in England, which prevented him. It was, however, with that genius for organisation which so remarkably characterised him, who adapted the Presbyterian form of government. He incorporated his ideas with that of State control, and so arranged that the Church should choose the presbyters, each of whom should have his allotted work, and the presbytery of whom together in Consistory should deal with all cases of ecclesiastical discipline.

There were ministers who were to preach and teach, and the elders who ruled the Church. Both, however, were recognised as having spiritual office. His idea was adopted in the Reformed Church of France, and in Scotland [SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF], where there are now three main bodies of Presbyterians, viz.: the Established Church, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterian Church.

In England Presbyterianism was introduced in 1572 at Wandsworth, when a church was opened with its "Book of Discipline."

In the struggles between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, Presbyterianism represented the side of the latter, and the downfall of Charles I. was the signal for the abolition of the Episcopal Church on 30th Jan., 1647. The famous WESTMINSTER CONFESSIO, and its Catechism, which we have in its place, represents the zenith of Presbyterianism in England. But in a very short time it was displaced by Independency and Nonconformity. The result was that Presbyterianism became altogether weakened as a power in England, and on the Restoration, the Episcopal ministers, most of them Presbyterians, were ejected from their livings.

In Scotland, Presbyterianism was down-kept until the Revolution. In England, it had not gained the affection of the most of the congregations, in reaction from Calvinism, became Unitarian. Nevertheless, Presbyterianism upon the old Puritan basis has been revived in the present century. In 1836 two Presbyteries were in union with the Church of Scotland, and were added in 1839. On the Scottish Union, in 1843, the English Presbyteries were in this connection, and joined the English congregations of the "United Church." In 1876 they were all united under the title of the "Presbyterian Church of England." In the census of 1881, 275 congregations were returned, of which seventy-five are in London. One of its noblest works is the China Mission.

In Ireland, Presbyterianism is the largest denomination in the province of Ulster, where there is a large population of Scottish blood. In America the first Presbytery met at Philadelphia in 1705. After many divisions and offshoots a reunion was established in 1870, when a great General Assembly met again at Philadelphia. It was then found that the Presbyterian Church contained no less than 4,238 ministers, with 446,561 members. In 1882 the ministers were 5,143, the Church members 592,128. The Presbyterian Church, therefore, of the United States is at present a very flourishing body.

Presbyterii Corona ["the crown, or circle, of the presbytery"].—An allusion to the fact that the seats of the presbyters in ancient churches were frequently arranged in a semi-circle, with the bishop's throne in the centre.

Presbytery [from the Greek word presbuterion, a word which is used twice in the Greek translation of the New Testament for "sanhedrin" (Acts xxii. 5, Luke xxii. 66)]. In the early Christian Church it signified the assembly of all the clergy of the diocese, both presbyters and deacons, as may be seen from the writings of St. Cyprian, Pope Siricius, St. Ignatius, etc. The word is often used in Scotland to designate the presbyter's house.

Presence, REAL. [LORD'S SUPPER.]

Presentation is the offering of a clerk by the patron to the ordinary for institution into a benefice. It is sometimes confounded with nomination, which, however, signifies the offering of a clerk to the patron that he may be presented. After presentation the bishop may, if the clerk presented show want of learning, or if he has been convicted of perjury or other great crime, refuse to institute him. If a presentation is not made to the bishop within six months after the living is vacant, it lapses to the bishop; after another six months, to the archbishop, and from him to the Crown.

Prester John, or John the Presbyter.—A king whom tradition declared to be reigning in the Indies, or Tartary, during the twelfth century. It is now doubted whether he really existed, and the legends concerning him are vague and contradictory. It was reported that a Christian king was reigning somewhere beyond Persia who had gained brilliant victories over the Mohammedans, and who was a priest as well as a king. Primer.—A manual of and elementary religious Primer, in its earliest form, reed, Lord's Prayer, and ts, was probably in use in es. In course of time were added, and it seems o centuries, at least, before "The Primer" was the uthorised by the Church of use of the laity. It was h, but sometimes partly

Matins and the Hours of Our Lady.
Evensong and Compline.
The vii. penitential Psalms [vi., xxii., xxxviii., li., cii., cxxx., cxliii.].
The xv. Psalms [Songs of Degrees. Psalms cx. —cxxxiv.].
The Litany.
Placebo [the Vespers for the dead, beginning Placebo Domino].
Dirge [the Office for the Dead, beginning with the anthem Dirige in conspectu tuo viam meam, Psalm v. 8].
The Psalms of commendation [Psalm cxix.]
Pater Noster.
Ave Maria.
Creed.
The Ten Commandments.
The Seven Deadly Sins.

In the reign of Henry VIII. several books of devotion were published under this title, but lacking authority. Such was Marshall's Primer, published in 1530, which omitted the Litany, on account of the invocations of saints contained therein. The Litany was inserted in a second edition [1535], but a warning against the invocations was added. In 1539, Hilsey, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, published another, "at the commandment of the right honourable Lord Thomas Crumwell." Hilsey's Primer contains "the bidding of the beads," on which our "bidding prayer" [See Canon LV.] is founded, and retains the prayers for the dead, but omits most of the invocations of saints from the Litany.

In 1545, Henry VIII. authorised the issue of what is called King Henry's Primer, "set forth by the King's Majesty and his clergy, to be taught, learned, and read; and none other to be used throughout all his dominions." It contained:—

The Kalendar.
The King's Highness' Injunction.
The Prayer of Our Lord.
The Salutation of the Angel.
The Creed or Articles of the Faith.
The Ten Commandments.
Certain Graces.
The Canonical Hours.
The seven Psalms.
The Litany.
The Dirge.
The Commendations.
The Psalms of the Passion [xxii., lxix., lxxxviii., ii., and lix.].
The Passion of Our Lord.
Certain godly prayers for sundry purposes.

This was several times reprinted and revised by the Bishops. The edition of 1549 omitted the remaining invocations of saints from the Litany; that of 1551 expunged the "Hail Mary" and other passages. To the editions of 1552 and 1559 the Catechism, as far as the end of the Lord's Prayer, was added. In 1560 a Latin version of the Primer, called the Horarium, was issued.

 several of the Popes, notably by Innocent

 the more popular doctrine, but in the present century that theory has entirely disappeared, and probabilism is the only existent theory.
 The greatest modern probabilist writer has

Processional Banner.—A banner carried in processions (e.g. on Rogation Days).
 Usually embroidered with some sacred emblem or picture.

Processionale.—A book of services for use in processions.

Procession of the Holy Ghost.—
 The doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Ghost is important as distinguishing His personality from that of the Son, who is Begotten. The Council of Constantinople, in extending the Nicene Creed to meet the Macedonian heresy, asserted it in our Lord's own words from John xv. 26: "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of Life; who proceedeth from the Father," thus expressing the belief of the universal Church. But though there was never any doubt in the Church as to the fact, there afterwards arose a serious controversy as to the manner of this procession. The Western Church generally held what is called the doctrine of the Double Procession, viz.
 that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son, and the phrase "and the Son" soon found its way into copies of the Creed. The addition is first heard of at the Council of Toledo, A.D. 589, at which was recited a Latin version of the Constantinoplitan Creed, containing the words et filio.
 The records of the Council make no mention of any discussion or dissension on the point, and it seems that those present were ignorant that any addition had been made to the original Creed. It is probable, therefore, that this form of the Creed was already widely current in the West. Nor does it seem that the doctrine of the Double Procession was yet denied by the Eastern Church, for we find it asserted without discussion at the English synod of Hatfield [A.D. 680], presided over by Archbishop Theodore, who had lately come from Tarsus. But in the eighth century we hear of disputes on the subject at the Council of Gentilly, where the envoys of Constantine Copronymus reproached the Western Church with adding to the primitive Creed, and again at the Council of Friuli, A.D. 796, where the "Filioque" clause was defended as being an explanation, not an addition. About this time Charlemagne entered into a correspondence with Pope Hadrian, remonstrating with him for approving a version of the Creed put forth by Sarasius of Constantinople, in which it was said that "The Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father

by the Son," and protesting against the statement "that the Holy Ghost proceedeth not from the Father and the Son, according to the Faith of the Nicene Symbol, but from the Father by the Son."

The Pope, in his answer, defended himself by quoting the Fathers, but, strange to say, does not deny that the words "and the Son" are in the primitive Nicene Creed appealed to by Charlemagne. The controversy had now assumed serious proportions, and in 809 a Council was convened by Charlemagne at Aix for its consideration. A complaint was here received that a certain monk of St. Saba's, named John, had attacked some Latin monks of Mount Olivet on account of this doctrine, and had even attempted to expel them forcibly from the place. The Council condemned John's action, and approved the Filioque clause. A report of the proceedings was forwarded to Pope Leo, with a request that he would confirm the decision; but he, while agreeing with the doctrine, condemned its insertion into the Creed as unauthorised, and caused two silver tablets to be set up in the church of St. Peter, engraved with the original form of the Creed in Latin and Greek. It was not long, however, before the addition was received and sanctioned by the Church of Rome as well as by the other Western Churches. The disputes on this subject between the Churches of the East and West seem now to have ceased for a time, but they were revived at a later period; and these, increased by the mutual jealousy of the bishops of Rome and Constantinople, led in 1054 to the schism between the two branches of the Church which continues to this day.

Processions.—Ecclesiastical processions are of early origin in the Church, being heard of as early as the time of Gregory Thaumaturgus [A.D. 254]. They were introduced into Constantinople by Chrysostom [A.D. 398]. The Church historian, Socrates, relates that the Arians, being forbidden to use any churches in the city, were accustomed to assemble about the porches, and march to their meeting-houses without the walls, singing anthems on the way. To counteract their influence, Chrysostom established processions of the orthodox, in which clergy and people perambulated the city singing hymns, and carrying large silver crosses and lighted wax tapers. By the fifth century, processions had come into general use in the Church. In 467, Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, on the occasion of a great earthquake, instituted processions to be held annually in Ascension week, for the purpose of imploring God's grace and protection. The observance of these Rogation days became general. In England they received the name of Gangdægas ("procession days"), and the perambulations of parishes then performed still survive in the custom of "beating the bounds." The joyful hymns and anthems, first sung in processions, were early replaced by solemn Litanies. Amongst these is the Litany of Gregory the Great, or the Great St. Mark's Day, which provides for processions setting out from different places and meeting at a central church for solemn service. It was from this Litany the anthem, chanted by Augustine monks on entering Canterbury, was derived. According to Scriptural and ancient usage the procession was a distinct service in and not, as now, a mere adjunct to some service.

Procopius.—Successor to Ziska of the Hussites. Procopius was of a noble though poor family. He had influential friends, however, through which means he received a good education, and was able to travel in foreign countries. He was devoted to the Church; but on the outbreak of the Hussite war between his country, Bohemia, and Germany, he threw himself heart and soul into the struggle, and took command under Ziska, leader of the Hussites. After the death of Ziska, their opponents planned an attack, thinking that as the Hussites were without a leader they would be easily conquered. They found out their mistake, however, when they met the Hussites in the field of Aussig [June 15th, 1426]. Procopius, with a small army, utterly defeated the Germans. After this battle the Hussites were joined by many of their Roman Catholic countrymen, and with their aid Procopius defeated an army led by those Electors of the Empire who had taken up the crusade in consequence of a crusade preached by the Reformers of Bohemia by Pope Martin V. in the year 1427. In 1429 Procopius called together a Diet at Prague to ask permission to go to Vienna and plead before the Emperor personally the wrongs under which the Bohemians were suffering. He demanded freedom of the free preaching of the Gospel in both kinds, and an arrangement regarding ecclesiastical property. His mission was ineffectual, and the same year he went into Germany at the head of 80,000 men, and returned home victorious. By this time the terror of their arms had spread through Europe, and Pope Eugenius IV. was upon him in 1439 to preach another crusade to offer all sorts of indulgences and remissions from penances to all who should take part in the expedition, and the result was an army of 130,000 men. There is no doubt that the army under Procopius would have been crushed by such overwhelming numbers if it not been that, when the armies met at Reichenberg on Aug. 14th, 1431, a sudden and most unaccountable panic seized the Imperial army, who to a man turned and fled, striking a blow. But this marvellous victory was not destined to last long. A civil war broke out between two sects of the C

Prophecy [Gr. pro, and phasia, "speech"].—The prefix pro has the threefold meaning of "beforehand," "in public,"
"in behalf of." But in its original meaning the second and third are the most important, and the word "prophet" expresses the same idea as the Hebrew nabi, "forth-teller," rather than "foreteller," and in a yet deeper sense expounder and interpreter of the Divine Mind and Will. This is the ancient and Biblical meaning of the term, which includes all who are called prophets in the Old and New Testaments.
There is no direct mention of a prophet in the early Patriarchal age. The name is, indeed, given to Abraham, but he utters no prophecies, and the predictions and prophecies which are made to him are never so called in the Bible. But Moses receives the name continually, and in the well-known passage in Deut. xviii. 15-18 he is made the type of the greatest of the prophets. With the death of Moses the gift seems to have fallen into abeyance. Joshua was highly indignant when he heard of Eldad and Medad prophesying in the camp. In the period of the Judges the only prophecy is that of Deborah. At the close of that period the office of Prophet becomes fixed and established. Samuel is the true founder of the Prophet order. The expressions in the New Testament, "until Samuel, the prophet," "Samuel and the prophets," exactly express his position. In his time we first read of the "companies of the sons of the prophets," called, in modern phraseology, the "schools of the prophets." Under the shadow of his name they dwelt as within a charmed circle. Their influence extended with a glow of inspiration over their lawless age of change and confusion. The two most remarkable of the succeeding age were Nathan and David. At the close of Solomon's reign the prophetic order became a ruling power in the State. Ahijah was the medium of transferring the crown of the kingdom of Israel to Jeroboam. From henceforth for two centuries, though glimpses of them appear from time to time in Judah, the prophets are almost entirely confined to Israel.
The great prophetic centres were all within the northern kingdom:—Bethel, Gilgal, Carmel, Jericho, Ramah. The prophets of this period are essentially prophets of action.
They are remarkable not for what they said but for what they did, not because they created but because they destroyed. Of this class Elijah is the great representative. He attained a place equal to those of Moses and Samuel in the annals of his country. He threw a new halo around the whole order.
He prepared the way for the succession of prophets who come before us within the next hundred years. He was the one who lingered longest in the affections and the expectations of his countrymen. Others who bore a more or less prominent part in this period were

Iddo, Jehu, Obadiah, and, chiefest of all, Elijah's immediate successor, Elisha.

The next period is that of written prophecies, represented by Amos, Hosea, and, according to some learned critics, the unknown prophet whose writings are contained in Zechariah ix.-xi., xiii. 7-9. These are the prophets of the northern kingdom; while in the southern kingdom we have Isaiah i.-xxxix., Micah, Joel, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Jeremiah, Obadiah, and, according to the same critics we have before referred to, the unknown prophet who has, like the one just mentioned, been incorporated in the works of Zechariah, and whose writings are contained in chapters xii., xiii. 1-6, and xiv. There are also two prophets especially connected with the Captivity—Ezekiel and the evangelical prophet called by the greatest German Hebraists, followed by Dean Stanley and others, the "Second Isaiah" or "the Great Unknown," whose writings are joined on to those of his great predecessor and namesake in chapters xl.-lxvi. In the period following the Captivity are Haggai, Zechariah, the unknown messenger called Malachi, and, if we accept the late date assigned by some of the modern critics, the Book of Daniel. The only prophet whose date cannot be fixed with any certainty is Jonah. An early Jewish tradition makes him the son of the widow of Zarephath. Others place him in the reign of Jeroboam II.; while many eminent critics think the book was not put together in its present form till long after the Captivity. It does not profess to have been written by Jonah, nor does it deal with the history of "the chosen people."

Such is a sketch of the history of the order; we proceed to consider its leading characteristics as an institution, and the character of the prophetic teaching.

We have said that in the highest sense of the word the prophets were the messengers and expounders of the Divine Will. They were usually called to their office through visions, such as those of the Burning Bush to Moses, of the Lord of Hosts to Isaiah, of the Wheels to Ezekiel. But their ordinary teaching was conveyed through the medium of their own thoughts, coloured by the circumstances in which they lived, and illustrated by the images of their every-day life. They were drawn from all classes of the community, from every station of life. David the king, Amos the herdsman, are instances to show the freedom of the order from any given circle of society. They were historians and biographers, though most of their work in this department is lost. The lives of David by Samuel, Gad, and Nathan; the lives of Jeroboam and Rehoboam by Iddo and Shemaiah; the acts of Uzziah and Hezekiah by Isaiah—unless we conceive Isaiah xxxvi.-xxxix. to form a part of the latter work—have all perished. It is, however, certain that, however composite their parts may be, the Books of Samuel and Kings were the work of or more of the prophets. Another important feature is to be found in their relation to State. They were statesmen; they identified themselves with their country more than any other class: they laboured to maintain national unity. In this position, sometimes in opposition to, sometimes in agreement with, the sovereign of the time, they maintained the true religion. They dwelt with undeviating emphasis on the great truths of the unity and the spirituality of the Lord, on the supreme importance of charity, justice, goodness, and purity; and on the uselessness of the Ritual, apart from the Moral Law. They were constant, vigilant watchmen after the kind of abuse and crime, and the fact that they lived constantly in the presence of God gave them the courage to say and do what was right and to be indifferent to both praise and blame. Another reason of their independence was their constant looking forward to the future. As we have already said, the use of the word which confines their work to mere prediction is not in accordance with fact. The cases of prediction of minute details fade away when submitted to examination, so that some critics have hesitated to assert, when a passage of the Prophet coincides with historical narrative, that this clearly indicates that the fact is first. This, however, is certainly an exaggeration, and though we may grant that the prophets of Christianity who come before us in the Acts of the Apostles are more declarers of the Divine Will than predictors of future, prediction is certainly a part of their function [e.g. Acts xi. 28; xxi. 11]. The rationalising school of German divines, on this ground maintained that the Book of Daniel was not written until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and is, in fact, a history written in the form of prophecy. This view is accepted by Dean Stanley in his Church. It was earnestly controverted by Pusey, who wrote a very learned treatise the purpose of proving that the commonly accepted date of Daniel is correct, that the book was written during the Captivity and is, in truth, prophetic and not a fiction. Yet it may be fairly asserted that there has been no diminution in the reverence with which, even by the most "handling" critics, the Hebrew Prophets are regarded. Their greatness is recognised in these critics as consisting not in the foretelling of future events, but in their erring vision, their profound and penetrating insight, the unflinching boldness and force with which they said that the unrighteous kingdoms of the heathen would not stand, the intense fervour with which they asserted that the world's salvation lay in recourse to the God of Israel.

we are carried along with their burning words, we are admitted not by any fanciful straining of words, or by any doubtful application of minute predictions, but by the likeness of spirit with spirit, to their highest and most universal application. We gradually learn that the most natural meaning is also the most supernatural; that while not excluding a really predictive element, it is largely through the likeness of situation and feeling, that the connection of the words of the original author with Christ and with the Christian Church is to be explained. The Prophets are especially prophetic of Christ, because they treat of those truths of the spiritual life of which He was the Great Revealer and Illuminator; because more than any other characters of the Sacred History they share in the Divine views respecting life and death, righteousness and sin, success and failure, which were most fully exemplified in Him; because they gave utterance to the noblest hopes and aspirations that ever entered into the heart of man to conceive, and which find their first and only entire fulfilment in the life and death, in the teaching and the revelation of the Divinest and Greatest of the Prophets.

Prophecyings.—A name given to meet- ings in the latter part of the sixteenth century, the object of which was instruction and increase of spiritual life by means beyond those provided in the Liturgy of the Church. They were gatherings, sometimes of clergy, sometimes of both clergy and laity. A moderator presided, and each clergyman present delivered his views on some subject settled beforehand. They are first mentioned as taking place at Northampton in 1571, and became extremely popular. But there was obviously a danger of irregularity. The clergy were tempted to frame their discourses in such manner as to win popularity by flattering the prejudices of their lay brethren, and to become congregationalists rather than men controlled by their bishops. Before long Archbishop Parker took alarm at them, and when they reached Norwich, the head-quarters in those days of Nonconformity, he wrote to the Bishop commanding him to stop them. Some lay Privy Councillors wrote a counter-letter begging the Bishop to hold his ground; but Parker repeated his command, and they were stopped. Archbishop Grindal, believing that the Church was greatly lacking in efficient preachers, encouraged the prophecyings. Queen Elizabeth severely rebuked him, and commanded him to see that they were everywhere stopped. The Archbishop replied that they did much good, and that he would not suppress them. “I would rather offend your earthly majesty than the heavenly majesty of God.” And he followed this by reminding the Queen that there was a judgment to come at which she must herself appear. She immediately convened a meeting of the Star Chamber, and proposed that Grindal should be deprived. With some difficulty the courtiers persuaded her to a milder course; the Archbishop was suspended, and confined to his house. Then the Queen sent a letter to all the bishops charging them to allow "no other service in the churches except that appointed by law, nor any to take part in public services except persons duly licensed." If any disregarded this command they were to be imprisoned. Most of the bishops obeyed. But Grindal's firmness—for he refused to apologise to the Queen, and remained for some years under her displeasure—had a great effect on public opinion. The prophesyings still continued, and in 1585 the Bishop of Chester is found making regulations for their better management, chiefly in the direction of limiting them to the clergy. Jeremy Taylor wrote in their favour his treatise on The Liberty of Prophesying.

Proselytes.—Converts to some religion, or religious sect, but especially to Judaism. Among the Jews they were of two classes: the first were called "proselytes of the gate," and were allowed to live among the Jews and enjoy the same protection, on the condition that they should observe the moral laws given to Noah; the second were the "proselytes of justice," who received circumcision, bound themselves to keep the whole Law of Moses, and became thenceforward "sons of Israel," holding all the rights and privileges belonging to the Jewish race. Slaves born in the service of a Jew were circumcised, but this only bound them to slavery during their master's pleasure, and they were not regarded as "true Israelites." But if the master set him free, the slave was baptised in the presence of three witnesses; and, if he refused to undergo this ceremony, he was sold again within twelve months. A proselyte who was not the son of a Jewess was not allowed to be a member of the Sanhedrin, or to hold any other public office.

Protestant Confessions.—These are Creeds, or Confessions of Faith, drawn up by the Reformed Church. The chief are:—

[1] Confession of Augsburg—A document drawn up by Melancthon with the approval of Luther, which was read at the Diet of Augsburg, June 25th, 1530, and was signed by the Elector of Saxony, the Margrave of Brandenburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and many others. It caused a deep impression, even on the Romanists. It was divided into two parts. The first, which contained twenty-one articles, stated the various points of belief held by the Reformers, and the second enumerated the seven principal abuses of the Church of Rome upon which Luther founded the necessity for leaving it, viz.:—Communion in one kind, celibacy of priests, private masses, confessions, the admission of tradition, monastic vows, and indulgences. Eck, theologian, prepared a confutation read on Sept. 3rd. The major the Reformers had been constrained to conform views, which they refused to Melancthon had prepared a Protevangelion.—The name of a book attributed to St. James, the first Bishop of Jerusalem, containing an account of the birth of the Virgin and that of Christ. A copy of the book in Greek was brought by Postelus from the East, and by him translated into Latin. The fables with which it is filled testify against its genuineness.

Prothesis.—A side-table in a church near the altar, on which the elements are to be placed before they are laid on the altar. This table, called in the East "Prothesis," and in the West "Credence Table," has been in almost universal use from the earliest Christian times. Though there is no actual mention of the prothesis in the Communion Office, yet there is a distinct allusion to it, as, immediately before the prayer for Christ's Church militant, it is made the duty of the priest to "then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient." Up to this point, then, the bread and wine must be in some convenient place near at hand, and this can only be on the Prothesis or Credence Table.

Protonotary.—This title seems to have been first used at Constantinople in the eighth century, and to have designated the chief of the notaries [from protos, "first"]. After A.D. 800 the title was introduced into the West, and now designates any of the College of Protonotaries Apostolic. Bishop Clement of Rome is supposed, in the first century, to have appointed a notary for each of the seven wards of the city, to keep a record of the sufferings of martyrs, etc. When it became necessary to appoint others, the seven original notaries were called "protonotarii Apostolici." Sixtus V. afterwards increased the number to twelve. In the Papal chapel they sit in the second tier, but in the consistories they sit with the Pope. Their duties are to register the Pontifical acts, to make and keep the official records of beatifications, etc.

Providence.—The superintending care which God exercises over creation. The arguments for the providence of God are generally drawn from the light of nature; the being of a God; the creation of the world; the wonderful disposing and controlling of the affairs and actions of men; the various blessings enjoyed by God's creatures; the awful judgments that have been inflicted, and the wonderful preservation of the Bible and the Church throughout every age, notwithstanding the attempts of earth and hell against them. Some have denied that the providence of God reaches beyond a general superintendence of the laws of nature, and say that He never interposes in the particular concerns of individuals. This would be to render His government imperfect, and would leave no ground for reposing any trust under its protection, for then the majority of human affairs would be fortuitous, without any regular direction, and tending to no special scope. But the uniform doctrine of Scripture is that nothing in the universe happens without God, that His hand is ever active, His decree or permission intervening in all, that nothing is too great or unwieldy for His management, nothing too minute or commonplace to be beneath His care; that while He is guiding the planets in their course through the heaven, or ruling the nations of the world, He is still watching over and guiding the humblest of His creatures. We cannot, it is true, understand the manner in which Providence interposes in human affairs, and we are equally at a loss to explain how it directs the motions of the heavenly bodies; but the fact remains that there does exist an overruling influence in the moral world, as certainly as in the natural. It would be impossible to conceive God acting as the Governor of the world, unless He were to govern all the events which happen in it; He would then be no more than an unconcerned spectator of the behaviour of His subjects, regarding the obedient and the rebellious alike with an eye of indifference. From the imperfection of our knowledge to ascertain what is good for us, and from the defect of our power to bring about that good when known, arise all those disappointments which continually prove that man is not master of his own lot; that, though he may desire, it is God who directs—God who can make the smallest incident an effectual instrument of His providence for overturning the most carefully elaborated plans of man. Accident, chance, and fortune are words to which much is ascribed in the life of man; but what are they but synonyms for the unknown operations of Providence? In God's universe nothing happens in vain or without a cause: in that chaos of human affairs and intrigues, or that mass of confusion and disorder in which we can see no light, all is clearness and order in the sight of Him who is governing and directing all, and bringing forward every event in its due time and place.

Province.—The district under the jurisdiction of an archbishop. In England there are the provinces of Canterbury and York.

Provost [Lat. propositus].—A name used in many senses during the first eight centuries, but first applied to the official next in authority to the abbot in a monastery, and, according to the rules of St. Benedict, of equal rank with the deaconus. The office of provost in a cathedral chapter was often incorporated with that of the archdeacon, and the term is now used in the Roman Catholic Church to denote the head of the cathedral chapter. Formerly the name was also given to the president of a meeting; to the chief of a body of canons; and to the member of the chapter who managed church estates, distributed the common income, and superintended discipline.

Prudentius of Troyes.—A Syn whose real name was Gelindo. He is Bishop of Troyes in 847, and died in 861. He took part with Gottschalk in controversy concerning Predestination wrote Ad Hinkmarum and De Præd. Je. Scetus. He also wrote part of the Ad Bertiniam, from 835 to 861. He was venerated after his death as a saint.

Prussia, CONVERSION OF.—The attempt to convert Prussia to Christianity made at the end of the tenth cent. Adalbert, Bishop of Prague, who made converts at Danzig, but was martyred by savage inhabitants, April 23rd, 997. A Duke of Poland, was more successful in continuing the work which Adalbert had begun, and compelled the people, about 1018, to submit to baptism; but Christianity had not taken deep root, and in 1161 we find the people made a bold stand against the religion, which they feared would interfere with their freedom, and succeeded in throwing off their yoke. They continued to resist attempts for their conversion till the thirteenth century, when the knights of the Teutonic Order undertook a crusade against them after about fifty years of war the population was almost exterminated. Christianity became permanently established in the country, as the Teutonic Knights settled in the territory from which they had driven their opponents.

Prynne. [PRYNNE.]

Prynne, WILLIAM [A. at Somersham, Somersetshire, 1600; d. in London, Oct. 1669].—A Puritan writer. He graduated Oxford, 1620, and afterwards studied law. His Histriomastix, an attack upon the abuses and frivolities of the time, created a sensation, and he was arrested on a charge of seditious writing. He was tried before Star Chamber, 1633, and, at the instigation of Archbishop Laud, was condemned to imprisonment, lifelong imprisonment, and the payment of an enormous fine. He was released by the Long Parliament, of which he was member, 1641, and took an important part in the trial of Laud, in which he acted as solicitor. He was violently opposed to the Restoration, and pleaded in the cause of non-resistance, which caused his expulsion from the House of Commons. His services in the cause of the Restoration were rewarded by appointment as Keeper of the Records in 1660, a work which was carried out with great accuracy. Prynne also wrote Ipseus, which was condemned by the House of Commons as libellous and seditious.

Psalmist. [PSALMIST].—One of the inferior orders of clergy in the early Church, whose duty it was to lead the choir.

the order is to be placed not later than the beginning or middle of the fourth century. The psalmistæ were admitted to their office by a priest, with this formula, "See how thou singest with the mouth thou singest with thy heart, AND WHAT THOU BEHEARST with thy heart thou approveest by thy deed."

Psalmody.—The art or practice of singing the Psalms.

Psalter.—The Book of the Psalms. The use of the Psalms in Christian worship undoubtedly dates from Apostolic times [Col. iii. 16], and has been continued ever since in the Church. They were held in high esteem, and St. Athanasius calls the Psalter "the epitome of the whole Scriptures." Christian education began with the Psalter, and in the early Church generally it was so often repeated that the poorest knew them by heart, and used to recite them at their work. From St. Basil we gather that the service in his time consisted mainly of psalmody and prayer, and still the arrangement in the daily service of the Greek Church. During the first centuries, candidates for holy orders were frequently required to have the Psalter by heart. The Patriarch of Constantinople refused to ordain any who did not know it by heart. Canons to the same effect were passed at the Eighth Council of Constantinople [A.D. 863] and the Council of Orvieto [A.D. 1215].

Arrangements of the Psalter for Divine Service have been numerous. Some Churches used twenty or thirty psalms for a service, many as fifty or sixty; while others used only twelve. By the rule of the Council of Nicaea, the number varied with the time of the day, the night and the season of the year, the whole Psalter being sometimes sung in two nights. In the mediæval Church, in the Church of Rome at the present day, the Psalms were distributed over the days of the week, so that the whole Psalter might be read weekly. The various arrangements were: [1] that on Sundays never varied; [2] that on the frequent occurrence of Saints' days the arrangement was continually being changed, with the result that half the Psalms were never sung at all. "Notwithstanding the ancient Fathers have divided the Psalter into seven portions, whereof every one is said at a Nocturn, now of late time a few have been daily said, and the rest neglected" [Prayer Book of 1549, Preface]. The gravity of this objection is shown by the fact, that in the Roman Church at the present day about fifty psalms are practically omitted. To overcome these difficulties, the English Reformation divided the Psalter into sixty parts, to be read through monthly, and the Sunday congregation have the whole presented to them in course of time.

There have been several modes of singing the Psalms. The earliest practice was for the whole congregation to sing each verse; but the custom, derived from the Jews, of antiphonal singing was early introduced. Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan, speaks of the Christians as singing a hymn in turns, and St. Basil states that they sang responsively. Sometimes verses were sung by the precentor and choir alternately, and sometimes the choir and congregation were divided into two bodies singing alternate verses. An order of singers [PSALMISTÆ] arose about the beginning of the fourth century, and Ambrose of Milan [A.D. 374] and Gregory the Great [A.D. 590] devoted considerable attention to the subject of psalmody, and introduced the systems of chanting which bear their respective names. [MUSIC.] In our Prayer Book the Psalms are said to be "pointed as they are to be sung or said in churches." This refers to the colon in the middle of each verse, corresponding with the division of the chant. The Gloria Patri is ordered to be said or sung at the end of every Psalm, "thus turning a Jewish Psalm into a Christian hymn." In the Breviary the Gloria was added to some, but not to all; and the American Church follows this rule to some extent in providing that the Gloria may be said or sung after every psalm, and shall be said or sung at the end of the whole portion or selection of psalms for the day. The Prayer Book version of the Psalms is taken from Cranmer's Great Bible, "set forth and used in the time of King Henry the Eighth and Edward the Sixth." It was retained when the present Authorised Version was published for two reasons: because the choirs and people had become familiar with it and because its language was smoother and more adapted for singing than the Authorised Version.

The Preface, giving the "Order how the Psalter is appointed to be read," states that "the Psalter followeth the division of the Hebrews." There are two other "divisions" besides that of the Hebrews followed in our Prayer Book, viz.:—the Greek, in which Pss. ix. 10 and cxiv. and cxv. are joined, and cxvi. and cxlvii. are each divided into two; and the Syriac, in which Pss. cxiv. and cxv. are joined, and cxlvii. divided.

Public Worship Regulation Act.
[ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.]

Publicani or Pauliciani.—A name given to the Western Cathari, whose religion was similar to that of the Pauliciani of the East. The name was given them by the crusaders in the twelfth century. A small band of Publicani arrived in England about the year 1160, under the leadership of one Gerard, an enthusiast who seems to have had some education, though his followers were entirely ignorant, and obeyed him blindly. In order that it was too favourable. Unfortunately the way that did not tend to peace whilst within reach. They urged the form of government as that of the present; Archbishop Whitgift, defending the Episcopal form, argued that it was in accordance with Christianity, but by the argument of Church government was rejected, and therefore the nation whichever it thought most had an argument was hardly deeply religious men, as certainly they were, and when they were sent to prison. But, old-fashioned clergy who had the days of Mary, and now contrayer Book, were unhappy and the change. The younger ingering regrets for the past, Puritanism. Their zeal was enough towards the end of Elizabeth there was a reaction in favour of "and decent order," which their hatred of mediævalism had brought about. They strove hard in Parliament, preparing the Book of Common Prayer [q.v.] for acceptance, and the opinion of the Book of Common Prayer went against them, and the Book of Common Prayer marks the final Church of England against anger manifested itself in the Martin Marprelate tracts, church ordinances "froth and that the books ought "to be referred to the Lord at Smithfield," destruction of the cathedrals, singing organs, trowling of psalms, choristers," called the bishops "vermin," "cozening knaves, rascals." It seems difficult now to see how such expressions could have proceeded from religious men, and it is needful to note the very different character of the Book of Common Prayer believed to have been written in the reign of King James I. the MILLENNARY PETITION for a revision of the Prayer Book. was called to discuss the matter at the General Conference, and the Puritans were treated uncourteously. About 1620 some of them began to emigrate to America, and founded a colony in New England and Massachusetts. It is about twelve years the emigrants numbered 10,000 persons. The tyrannical rules of the Church, both in the Church and the world, resulted in the Great Rebellion and for the time being of Church. In September, 1642, an Act was passed abolishing prelacy in England, and commanding all to take the covenant. It is said that the number of clergymen who were rejected for refusing amounted to 7,000, and that more were turned out by the Presbyterians in three years than were deprived by the Roman Catholics in Queen Mary's time. After the Restoration the name "Puritans" was dropped, and that of NONCONFORMISTS [q.v.] adopted.

Pusey, EDWARD BOUVERIE, D.D.—A great Hebrew scholar and leader of a school of thought in the English Church [b. at Pusey, near Oxford, 1800; d. at Ascot Priory, Oxford, Sept. 16th, 1882]. In 1822 he took a first-class in classics at Christchurch, and in the next year was elected Fellow of Oriel, and was thus brought into contact with Newman, Keble, and Whately. He travelled in Germany during 1826 and 1827, and studied German theology—a region hitherto almost unexplored—under Dr. Tholuck; and the result was the publication, on his return, of a book in favour of German rationalism. The ability of the work was soon recognised, and at the death of Dr. Nicoll, Regius Professor of Hebrew, in 1828, Pusey was appointed to the chair, which carried with it a canonry of Christchurch. From this time he was accustomed to hold meetings of clergy for theological discussions at his house. Already the movement for Church reform had begun, and Pusey, after a long hesitation, joined the Anglo-Catholic party, and began writing some of the Tracts for the Times. The first which he wrote was Thoughts on the Benefits of the System of Fasting enjoined by our Church, and soon after followed Scriptural Views on Holy Baptism. The power with which he wrote placed him far in advance of the greater number of his fellow-workers, and on Newman's secession to the Roman Church Pusey took, by common consent, the leadership of the movement. As a matter of fact, the party was already known as "Puseyites," the reason being that, though Newman was the real leader, he was comparatively unknown except in Oxford, whereas Pusey held a greater position. Newman was Fellow and Tutor of his college, but Pusey was Hebrew Professor and Cathedral Canon. In 1843 he preached a sermon called The Holy Eucharist a Comfort to the Penitent, for which he was suspended by the Vice Chancellor from preaching at Oxford for two years. The sentence defeated its own end, for he was looked upon as a martyr, and his books gained a wider circulation than before. His teaching has exerted more influence on the Church of England than any other of the present century, and gave a new life and energy to religion, in its corporate or Church capacity, as distinguished from the individual direction which had been given by the Wesleyan movement a hundred years before. His works consist chiefly of sermons, two treatises on The Doctrine of the Real Presence in the Eucharist, and Biblical expositions. His quarto volume on the Minor Prophets is the best work on this part of Holy Scripture which has ever been published in England, and there is no book, whether produced at home or on the Continent, which displays the minute scholarship and research of his work on The Prophet Daniel. This work is not in the form of a commentary, but a series of disquisitions intended to show that the book is not the late production which the leading modern scholars of Germany, followed by Dean Stanley, have pronounced it, but that it was really written in the days of the Babylonian captivity. Dr. Pusey also published works on the Royal Supremacy, and on Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister. Dr. Newman in his Apologia expresses his conviction, that though they had worked together so harmoniously, Pusey was "never near the Catholic Church." In 1865 Pusey published his Eirenicon, intended, while justifying the position of the Church of England, to show that re-union with the Church of Rome by mutual explanations was within hope. One remarkable result came from this. Pusey had attacked very severely the cultus of the Blessed Virgin in the Roman Church, and had quoted some passages from popular books of devotion, to Protestant ears at least most painful and offensive. Newman wrote a reply in which, after saying that Pusey had "discharged his olive-branch from a catapult," he declared that the prayers and devotions quoted by Pusey were so shocking and repulsive to him that they were like a nightmare, that nothing should induce him to use them. One might say that here already was a concession made, an acknowledgment that the popular practice of the Roman Church needed correction. Another work of Pusey was occasioned by Archdeacon Farrar's work entitled Mercy and Judgment. Pusey replied to it in a volume What is of Faith Concerning Eternal Punishment? In conjunction with Keble and Charles Marriott, Pusey began editing the Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church, and the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology. No biographical notice of this remarkable man would be complete without reference to the revival of the Confessional in the Church of England, which was largely owing to him. He was in the habit of receiving many confessions, and acting as spiritual director, and some of his writings were in support of the practice. Of his deep personal holiness and fervent piety there was no question, and there is no name of this century which has been more generally revered in the Church of England.

Pyrrho, the founder of a school of scepticism, was born in Greece in the fourth century B.C. The mainspring of his teaching was the belief that there was no exact criterion for the knowledge and distinction of things; and therefore he suspended his judgment and declined pronouncing upon the real quality of anything. Eusebius quotes him as saying of these philosophers, "I am foul of their own principles; and by other people stand clear of all opinions not aware that they recommend and at the same time; for they pronounce measure upon things, when they say is to be affirmed about them."

Pythagoras.—A Greek philosopher in the island of Samos probably about year 570 B.C. He is said to have been a disciple of the philosopher Anaximander and taught him geometry. The high imagination and earnest spirit of the youth took fire at the possibilities of exploration seemed to him before him. The science spoke of him of distinctness, and definiteness, and around it he became conscious that the mysteries and sublimities which it hid but did not reveal. Beyond the finite the infinite, among all the numbers some existed Unity. With the desire for knowledge he set forth to travel, but as there are many traditions and stories they are but little to be trusted. Somewhere, however, the number mystery was to be present with him: all social government became connected with it in his mind; he observed the periodical occurrences in Nature, all the religious regulations, observances of different races, and reasoned on the Unit, on the Triad, on the Square, until numbers seemed to him the vital principle of the World. He held to be breathing, consequently he reasoned that the First Cause, the Unit, is "the finite Breath, or Spirit," which divides into a countless multiplicity of number things. The world he conceived to consist of five elements—Fire, Air, Water, Earth, and Ether. In the centre of the Universe was the principle of Life, and all moved in harmonic music of the spheres.

Turning from the Universe to Man, Pythagoras recognised that there is more to the physical frame. For he could carry his mind back to the age of Achilles and Hector, and could project himself into the age to come. The limits of space and time were therefore transcended. And he came to the conclusion that the soul, which can thus look before and after, and can also shrink and shrivel into incapacity of contemplating anything but the present, must be capable of immortality and infinite degeneracy. Pythagoras did not originate the doctrine of the transmigration of souls; he may have learned it in his Egyptian travels or in his initiation into the sacred mysteries, but he harmonised it with his thoughts and feelings, and he adopted it. Soul, he thought, might descend into beasts or rise to life; there is a law accurately determining their elevation or descent. Consequently are perhaps the best known and most admired of his works. The Elegies, written in memory of his friend, Dr. Allmer, Archdeacon of London, have a peculiar beauty and pathos of their own. In 1631 he lost his friend Drayton, and he wrote the epitaph on the monument to him in Westminster Abbey. The Hieroglyphics resemble the Emblems, but are very eccentric in measure, yet are peculiarly impressive. Some beautiful lines were written by Quarles on the death of Archbishop Ussher, to whom he was secretary for some time, and who wrote of Quarles to a friend as "a poet held in considerable esteem for his sacred compositions." The home life of Francis Quarles showed consistent piety. His wife writes, "that he was courteous and affable to all, and moderate and discreet in all his actions." He was an ardent student, rising before three o'clock in the morning for that purpose. He possessed, too, a great charm in conversation. His fatal illness is said to have been brought on by sorrow when a petition was presented by eight men, imputing to him serious errors in his religious belief. He died in September, 1644, and was buried at St. Leonard's, in Foster Lane. His widow writes in the Memoir that "the blessed end of her dear husband was in every way answerable to his godly life." It has been said that if Quarles had written Enchiridion at Athens or Rome, he would have been classed among the wise men of his country.

Quartodecimans.—On what day the festival of the Resurrection ought to be celebrated was a question which caused much anxious thought and bitter dispute in the primitive Church. Some aimed at observing the actual anniversary by keeping it on the same date in each year. Others, guiding themselves by the Jewish reckoning for the Passover, chose the fourteenth day of the first moon in the new year, whatever day of the week that might happen to be; others again deferred the commemoration to the first Sunday after the first full moon. For both of the two latter customs Apostolical authority was pleaded: the former was said to have been sanctioned by St. Philip and St. John, and was generally observed by the Churches of the East, while for the commemoration on the Lord's Day appeal was made to the authority of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the Western Church adopted the custom. One pleasing incident in the controversy was the visit of the saintly Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, to Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, to confer with him on the vexed point. Unable to agree, each thinking himself supported by the practice of Apostles, they agreed to differ, and Polycarp was invited by Anicetus to be celebrant at the Holy Eucharist, and they parted in peace respecting each other's convictions. This was in A.D. 158. Shortly after the Quartodeciman rule (so-called because relating to the fourteenth day) became associated with Judaistic opinions and practices, and, in consequence, called forth the reprobation of Pope Victor, A.D. 180. Henceforward the dispute was carried on with intense bitterness, and after the Council of Nicæa had decreed in favour of the commemoration on the Lord's Day, the Quartodecimans were regarded as heretics and schismatics.

Queen Anne's Bounty.—A full account of this fund will be found under ANNATES, but we may add here a few more details derived from recent returns. The Royal Bounty was ratified by an Act passed in 1704, but for the first few years the Corporation was unable to devote any substantial sum out of the £13,000, which was the average amount of their gross income, to the purposes of the trust. An Act passed in the year 1708 which discharged all livings not exceeding the yearly value of £50 from the payments of Tenths, still further reduced the revenue to about £10,000; and it was not till 1713 that any scheme of augmentation was entered upon. In that year two lists were prepared, in the first of which all livings under £10 per annum were scheduled, and in the second all under £35 per annum. In 1788 the trustees were further empowered under the Sign Manual to give £200 to cures not exceeding £50, and this maximum value of benefices to be similarly augmented was in 1804 increased to £60, and in 1834 to £200 a year. The system of making grants only to meet benefactions now became general, and it was reported in 1868 that the total amounts of such free grants between 1836 and 1868 was only £10,600, while the total yearly appropriations averaged £11,600. The total value of the trusts vested in the Corporation on Dec. 31st, 1881, was £4,171,470 14s. 11d., which is the gross sum of the appropriations made by the board since its institution, and of the private and other benefactions vested in the governors as trustees of the clergy. The Royal Bounty Fund in 1881 amounted to £48,591, of which £27,800 was appropriated in grants to meet benefactions.

Quessel, PASQUIER [b. 1634, d. 1719], was educated at the Sorbonne, ordained priest in 1659, and in 1662 appointed Director of the Seminary of the Oratory. Soon after, he began to publish his celebrated work Réflexions Morales, written for the instruction of the young men under his charge. These found many readers, and were recommended by many bishops. But it was found that his work contained the obnoxious doctrines of Jansen [JANSENISM], and having refused to sign the formula against these opinions in 1675 he left Paris, and went to the Netherlands. Here he continued his Réflexions, which were published at Brussels in 1693-4. De Noailles, as Bishop of Châlons, in 1695 strongly recommended Quessel's in his diocese; but scarcely a year later he was made Archbishop of Paris, their opponent and condemner. Quessel was arrested and imprisoned by order of Louis XIV., but made his escape and fled to England, and died at Amsterdam at a great age. His book was condemned by the celestine Pope Innocent XII. as Unigenitus. He wrote also a Life and Traditions of the Romish Church, and a line of the Church, and some dogma.

Quietists.—A school of mysticism sprung up in the seventeenth century. Quietists stated that they resigned absolutely to God's will, that is, they renounced self entirely, and without thought, hope, or wish; in fact, of mental inactivity. The doctrines were first given to the world in a book called The Spiritual Guide, written by a Jesuit [q.v.], which was published in Spain and was translated into several languages. It represented to a great extent in teaching of the Jansenists in France. One of the chief supporters of its doctrines was M^{rs}. GUYON [q.v.], a Jansenist defended by Fénelon. They taught that the worship of the Church was compared to private devotion for comfort to the soul, and the true way through is to promote thought of God rather than thought of God. The sect have been held by various sects under different names, and will be found under the following heads:—EUCHITES, BASSA, HESYCHASTS.

Quignon was the son of a Frenchman who, while still very young, became a member of the Franciscan Order of monks, and made a General of the Order in Italy. He came under the notice of the Emperor Louis XIV., who made him one of his Council of science. At the time of the struggle between the Emperor and the Pope, Quignon was employed to negotiate between the two, and the manner in which he settled the business pleased the Pope that he sent him a cardinal's hat. He is however chiefly famous for a book which he compiled, in which his aim was to make the reading of the Bible the most prominent feature in the service. In this respect the compilers of our Bible followed his example. He denounced certain superstitions which had crept into the service of the Roman Church, and for this reason was recommended by two Popes, but was never in favour, and had very little success. Copies of it are, therefore, rare.

to the end of the last century. It may be divided into two periods, the first from the fifth century B.C. to the fifth century A.D. and the second from the fifth century A.D. to its disappearance. It was caused by the reorganisation of the social, moral, and religious life of the Jews according to the Mosaic Law, which brought about a union between school and government. The Hebrew was rendered into Chaldee, and was added to by explanations, illustrations, etc., and a tradition was formed which became in the eyes of the people of equal importance with the written Law.
Later on, the Mishna was edited by Hillel and Jehuda; by it the Mosaic Law, which had formerly been treated under 613 heads, was now reduced to six. During the latter part of the fourth century a rivalry grew up between the Persian and Babylonian schools.
The Babylonian Talmud was re-arranged by Rabbi Ashe, the head of the Rabbinical schools;
the Rabbinical schools throughout Persia were closed.

The second epoch of Rabbinism is less interesting than the first. The Babylonian Talmud was brought to Europe and translated into Arabic. Maimonides succeeded in reconciling the liberal form of Rabbinism which had grown up in Spain and the orthodox form which had appeared in Gaul and Italy, and it flourished till the thirteenth century, when the persecutions of the Inquisition partly destroyed it. However, the Cabbala was studied till the last century, when Moses Mendelssohn rose against it. At the present time Rabbinism is superseded by Rationalism.

Radbert, PASCASE. [PASCHASIUS RAD-BERTUS.]

Raikes, ROBERT, Founder of Sunday-schools, was born at Gloucester in 1735. His father was a printer and editor of the Gloucester Journal, who, after giving his son a liberal education, brought him up to the business, to which he afterwards succeeded.
He began visiting the prisons, and, finding the bad condition in which they were, drew attention to it in his paper, and brought about a great reformation in the county bridewell.

In 1781, being struck by seeing the ragged groups of children playing in the streets, he determined to try and improve their condition, so, finding four decent, well-disposed women who kept schools for teaching to read, he hired them to instruct as many children as he could assemble together on Sunday in reading and in the Church catechism. For this he agreed to pay them a shilling each a day. There is a letter in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1784 [p. 410], in which he describes the wonderful success of his plan, saying that the place was quite a heaven on Sundays compared to what it used to be. The system soon spread all over England, Scotland, and America. [SUNDAY SCHOOLS.] Raikes died suddenly at Gloucester, on April 6th, 1811.

Raleigh, ALEXANDER, an Independent minister, the author of many theological works, was born at Kirkcubright in 1817, carried on business for a short time in Liverpool, and went to Blackburn College, and in 1844 became pastor of a chapel at Greenock, whence he moved successively to Rotherham [1850], Glasgow [1855], and London [1859]. He died in London in 1880.

His chief works are, Quiet Resting-Places, The Story of Jonah the Prophet, The Little Sanctuary, and other Meditations, Thoughts for the Weary and the Sorrowful, etc.

Ralph de Diceto, old English historian, born in the twelfth century, was Dean of St. Paul's, and flourished in the reign of King John. He was greatly eminent for his learning, and was esteemed one of the best English historians in the reign of Edward I., when the sovereignty of the kings of England over the kingdom of Scotland was claimed and set forth from records and history. His history begins with William the Conqueror, and reaches to the death of King John. It has been reprinted among the works of the old English historians.

Rammohun Roy, a Hindoo reformer, was born in Burdwan, Bengal, in 1772. He was educated in the Brahman faith, but early renounced polytheism, and formed in Calcutta the BRAHMOO SOMAJ, or "Church of God" [q.v.]. In 1830 he came to London as representative of the Sovereign of Delhi, to demand an increase of stipend, which was granted. He died at Stapleton Park, near Bristol, September 27th, 1833. He translated the Vedants, or Revelation of all the Veds; published selections from the New Testament under the title, The Precepts of Jesus, the Guide to Peace and Happiness; and wrote Apology for the Pursuit of Final Beatitude. While in England he worshipped with the Unitarians, as, though he admired the precepts of Christ, he did not believe in His Divinity.

Rancoe. [TRAPPE, LA.]

Ranke, LEOPOLD VON [b. Dec. 21st d. May, 1886].—A famous historian. Not of the nobility by birth, the title was granted him in 1866 by the Emperor King of Prussia. He had four brothers, all of whom have made names for themselves one way or other. Leopold was educated at Leipzig, and while there showed a real talent for historical criticism. Soon after he was appointed to a professorship at Frankfort-on-the-Oder; but it was considered desirable that he should reside in Berlin, so he resigned this appointment in 1825, and became Professor of History at the University of Berlin. He published his first work, History of the Germanic and Latin Nations in the Reformation Period, in 1824. He was a man of great strength and industry, wrote books, all involving great research, and each other all through his life with extraordinary rapidity. His History of the Germanic Nations is generally thought to be the most brilliant work he wrote, and certainly was the chief means of making him famous in Europe. He was speaking of this work in one of his lectures at the Edinburgh Review, says it "is known and esteemed wherever German literature is read." In 1841 the late King of Prussia, Frederick William IV., asked him to write a full account of the history of Prussia; this work was published six years later. He lived for the most part a very quiet and simple life, seldom leaving his house in Berlin, taking no active part in the political movements of the time, though he studied each movement roughly with regard to its probable influence on future history. He made one exception to this rule in 1848, when a Parliament was convened at Frankfort with the idea of reconstructing the German Constitution, and about uniting the German nation under one king. The scheme came to nothing, and for the time Ranko devoted himself to his studies and to his lectures. During the years that followed he published a History of France at the Time of the Reformation, a History of England during the Seventeenth Century, a History of the Characters of the Chief Men of Italy and Spain, and several other works on different periods in the history of his own people. These occupied him constantly until 1880, and in that year, at the age of eighty-six, he announced his intention of writing his great Weltgeschichte. He never expected, of course, that his work would be in any way completed, but "Altmeister," as his fellow-countrymen lovingly called him, worked steadily day after day, giving one volume a year to the press, and at his death he had brought the work nearly into the Middle Ages. To have failed ding to the plan he worked out at the would have taken three more years. he lived so quietly, and, except by made so little stir in the world, he all the honours which it is possible any man to receive, both by his own and foreign ones, France conferring est distinction she has in her power that of being a Member of the

nalism.—The setting up of reason upreme arbiter, and causing the and the mysteries of Christianity erpreted and judged by it alone. ystem was the natural outcome of mation so far as this: the tradi- thod was abandoned, for men claimed : of appealing to the Scriptures . The authority of the Church to lters on opinion was denied when igned the Pope's Bull. It thus be- ssary to find another basis of belief, as in good faith that the early

German rationalists declared that the evidence for Christianity was found in its harmonising with the instincts and needs of the soul. It was later developments which, ignoring the presence of sin in the world, and of the darkness produced by sin, exalted reason above mystery, and proceeded to eliminate everything supernatural from religion, to discredit miracles, or to regard them as Oriental exaggerations of natural operations, and to question the inspiration of the Bible. [KANT, DEISM, MIRACLES, EVIDENCES, INSPIRATION, REVELATION.]

Ratisbon, CONFERENCE OF, which met in 1541, was the sequel to the one held in Worms the previous year. The Emperor, Charles V., hoped by these conferences to settle the religious differences in Germany, without having to proceed to hostilities, but at the conclusion of the proceedings the members agreed that more was wanted to heal the divisions than a mere theological formula, and the Conference ended without having arrived at any real result.

Ratramnus or Bertram.—A priest and monk in the Monastery of Corbie, Picardy, in the ninth century. Nothing is known of his private life, but he was famous in his time as a writer, and was consulted by Charles the Bald in matters of ecclesiastical controversy. He was employed to reply to the encyclical letter of Photius, and wrote against the doctrine of Transubstantiation as given by Paschasius Radbertus, though he taught that there is a mystical presence under the symbols in the Eucharist. His book was written after 844, and called De Corpore et Sanguine Domini. The book was condemned two centuries later, as it was supposed to have been the work of John Scotus Erigena; but was used by Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, in 1526, in opposition to the arguments of Œcolampadius. Ridley's views on the Sacrament seem to have been formed by the study of this book. It continued to be regarded as spurious till the seventeenth century, when Sainte Beuve proved its authenticity. Against Photius Ratramnus wrote Contra Græcorum opposita, and in the Gottschalk controversy De Prædestinatione Dei and Trina Deitas.

Ravenna.—A city of Italy which formerly stood on the shores of the Adriatic, but is now about five miles inland, owing to the deposits made by the Po at its mouth. It is famous in secular, but especially in ecclesiastical, history. Tradition says that a pupil of St. Peter named Apollinaris preached Christianity there in 79 A.D., and was martyred there. The truth of this is doubtful, but that the city contains Christian monuments of a very early date is certain, and the architecture of the churches marks distinctly the three nations which have at different times occupied the city—the Theodoxians, the Goths, and the Byzantines. It was made the seat of a bishop in very early times, and in 419 Honorius choosing to live there, it was raised to a metropolitan see. It became at last so powerful that we read of several bishops asserting that they were absolutely independent of the Bishop of Rome, and the question was only definitely decided in favour of the Pope in 861. Ravenna was chosen several times as the meeting place of synods, but none of them were worthy of note. The town is famous also as being the place where Dante finished his Divina Commedia, and where he died, on Sept. 14th, 1321.

Raymond Martini.—A Dominican monk [b. at Suberta, in Catalonia, early in the thirteenth century; d. after 1284]. He entered a monastery at Barcelona, and distinguished himself by his learning, especially in Oriental languages, which in those times were very rarely studied. He afterwards became a missionary among the Spanish Jews, and went to Tunis to convert the Mahometans, against whom he wrote Pugio Fidei. He wrote also a refutation of the Koran, which no longer exists, and a Capistrum Judæorum; this and the Pugio Fidei were made use of by a Carthusian monk in a book called Victoria contra Judæos.

Readers.—In the early Church the readers were looked upon as an inferior order of clergy, and we often find them mentioned in the writings of St. Cyprian. We cannot trace their existence further back than the third century, but after that time they appear to have been very numerous, and to have been distinctly recognised by the Fathers of the Church. In the present day the title of LAY READER [q.v.] is given to a man authorised by the bishop to help the priest in certain parts of public worship.

Real Presence. [LORD'S SUPPER.]

Realists.—The opponents of the NOMINALISTS [q.v.] among the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages. Their main doctrine, which is also attributed to Aristotle, was that "UNIVERSALS" [q.v.] have an independent existence; nay, that they, or Ideas, are the only real existences, inasmuch as all visible things grow, change, and perish. Wise men perish, but their wisdom is eternal. Universals exist, therefore, independently of things, and of our conceptions of them in the Divine Intellect. And the supreme reason of man is to have his thoughts in conformity with the Divine ideals. Realism, therefore, accepting the Divine origin of the Church, taught complete submission to authority, and the necessity of looking to God only for revelation and light. The founder of this school of thought was Anselm, and the work was taken up and carried on by Thomas Aquinas and William of Champeaux.

Rebaptising.—A word employed in want of a better, to denote the administration of baptism, by a lawful minister, to those who at some previous time have been invalidly baptised by heretics or schismatics. Rebaptism, if orthodox, is by nearly all Churches recognised as valid.

Recluse.—Properly speaking should only apply to those who take monastic vows and wish to lead the most secluded lives possible. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries, those who had proved themselves able to lead a thoroughly ascetic life were allowed this so-called privilege, many of them being locked up in a cell for life. When they had once given themselves up to this life they were obliged to continue, and could not get absolution except by order of the bishop. The word now has a wider meaning, and is applied to people who simply live in seclusion and away from the world.

Recollects.—A minor branch of the Franciscan Order of monks. They were first proposed to have been given them by Pope VII., who in 1531 granted houses to those who possessed "the Spirit of Recollection." At the foundation of the Order of St. Francis, the Order divided into two parties, the Conventuals and the Observants, the former living in monasteries under a not very strict rule, the latter following more exactly the rule of their founder, especially those in regard to poverty. At the end of the sixteenth century the Observants in Italy were numbered by the reigning Pope "Reformed Franciscans." They spread very rapidly in France in the seventeenth century, and were in great favour at Court. It was in this country that the term "Recollects" most frequently came into use. They stood their ground well all through the agitation caused by the Jansenists, and refused to relax their rules in the least degree. The Order was suppressed during the Revolution, but has lately reappeared in several towns in France.

Rector ["governor"].—A term applied to several persons whose offices are very different:—[1] The rector of a parish is a clergyman who has the charge and care of a parish that possesses all the tithes, whereas a vicar has a portion, the rest going to the rector of the great tithes. [2] The rector is given to the chief officer in some colleges, as at Exeter and Lincoln, and at Oxford, as well as at the Scotch Universities; it is also sometimes given to the headmaster of a large school. [3] Rector is also given to several convents for the superior who governs the house. The Jesuits give the name to the superior of such of their houses as were either seminaries or colleges.

recusant.—One who refused to attend worship of the Church of England. recusants were Roman Catholics who refused attendance, and one tried and convicted of the offence was a "Popish recusant."

Redemption. [WORK OF CHRIST.]

Redemptorists.—An Order founded in 1822 by St. ALPHONSUS MARIA DE LIGUORI, its chief object being to provide a set of men to work amongst the poor. In this Order he received the assistance of Falcoia, Bishop of Avellamare, and the work was begun at Avella where he had previously founded a community of nuns. In 1749 the Order was confirmed, and its rules approved by Pope Benedict XIV. He gave it first the title of "Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer," but as there was an Order of the same name in another part of Italy, the Pope ordered that the title should be changed to "the Most Holy Redeemer," to prevent confusion. The members, who were called Redemptorists, had, in addition to the general vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity, to take a special oath that they would work diligently for the Order till their death. Their great object was to be the conversion of the most poor and miserable, especially those living in great numbers who would otherwise be left to a large extent destitute. Besides this, Liguori insisted on constant study among his disciples as a means towards being of more use to the Church. The Order still exists in most countries of Europe although at different times, through revolutions and various other causes, it has been banished. It was introduced into England in 1843, and has now six houses in the Channel Isles. The nuns are called Redemptresses; they live in strict enclosure, devote their whole time in praying for the success of the Redemptorist missions. The seat of government is Rome, where the Superior of the Order, who has the title of Major, superintends the general work of the society in all parts of the world. Elected for life, but the heads of the houses, who are appointed by him, may only hold office six years.

Rees, Thomas, D.D.—A Congregational Minister [b. at Llanddeilo, Cardigan-shire 1785; d. 1885]. Author of a History of Nonconformity in Wales [1861], and of Barnes's Notes on the New Testament into Welsh. He was a minister at Llanddeilo for twenty-two years, and was one of the Congregational Union the year of his death.

Reformation.—To give in detail the history of the great religious revolution of the sixteenth century would be almost to write the history of Europe. Our object in the following article will simply be to indicate the causes and the occasions which produced the mighty changes in the several countries and the most prominent results. Let it be remembered that causes and occasions are by no means synonyms. An occasion furnishes reason for present action, but the causes lie further back. Henry VIII.'s divorce was the occasion of England's breach with Rome, but the causes had been gathering for whole generations before.

As far back as the twelfth century St. Bernard, called "the last of the Fathers," had sadly cried out that he longed before he died to see the Church of God as it was in the ancient days. And the cry had gathered strength in succeeding years. The great Councils of the fifteenth century—Pisa, Constance, Basle—had called for "purification of head and members." And so there is also a long list of illustrious names—Gerson, Grostête, Bradwardine, Colet, Sir Thomas More—men who would have been indignant at any suspicion thrown upon their faithfulness to the Church, who were urgent in their demands for reform. Bossuet, in his Variations des Églises Protestantes, attempts to break the force of this fact by saying that these doctors never thought of changing the faith of the Church, or of correcting her worship, or of subverting the authority of her prelates, and chiefly that of the Pope. But unhappily the conscience of men came to the conviction that the practical evils of the Church had their root in doctrine. The shameful sale of indulgences and masses came out of corrupt teaching concerning the intermediate state. So, again, when it was seen that in one year nearly a thousand pounds were offered at the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket, and during the same period not one penny at the altar of Christ, it is no wonder if the suspicion arose that errors had crept into the Church concerning saintly intercession and invocation.

Of the manifold causes which wrought together to produce the Reformation, three stand out the most prominent:—

[1] The Papacy.—No Roman Pontiff—not Gregory VII. nor Innocent III.—ever advanced loftier claims than did Boniface VIII., when, in 1302, he addressed to the Christian world his Bull UNAM SANCTAM [q.v.]. That was the culminating point of Papal power, and the two centuries that followed saw its rapid decline. The removal of the Papal Court to Avignon brought more clearly to the light its corruptions and cruelties, and exhibited the Supreme Pontiff as the puppet of the French King. The Great Schism, which followed and lasted through forty years, gave a still ruder shock to traditional reverence for the See. At this moment, too, the nations of modern Europe were consolidating and settling their national life, a state of things which "could not fail to give an impulse, hitherto unknown, in calling up the nationality of many a Western State, in satisfying it that the Papal rule was not essential to its welfare, and in thereby adding strength to local jurisdictions" [Hardwick's Reformation]. How strong this impulse was may be seen in the fact that at the Council of Constance the vote was taken, not by individuals, but by nations—viz. the English, German, French, and Italian. That method of voting was the precursor of national reformations. To this must be added the personal character of the Popes themselves. Blunt's statement is no exaggeration when he says that "for sixty years before the final breach was made, there had not been a Pope, except Clement VII., who could be called even a decent Christian" [Blunt's Reformation, p. 242]. It is a shame even to mention the deeds of vileness which make up the life of such men as Pope Alexander VI.

[2] The revival of letters and the impulse given by it to human intellect was a second cause of the demand for reformation. The revival of learning in Italy—and Italy led the way in everything in those days—was, in its temper, simply Pagan. The Decameron of Boccaccio was saturated with the Pagan spirit. An eclogue of Geraldini on the Passion spoke of the Lord Jesus Christ as "Daphnis," and "Daphnis in an odoriferous garden" is the commencement of the agony in Gethsemane. At the Court of the Medici it was a characteristic of good society to dispute the fundamental principles of Christianity, and the narratives of Holy Scripture and the mysteries of the Faith became subjects of derision. Leo X., in all probability, was an infidel. "Marvellous," says Dr. J. M. Neale, "was the infatuation which could expend all its zeal in the discovery of the last books of Tacitus and Livy, in the production of the purest Ciceronian Latin, in the erection of Classical churches, and which could pay for all these Pagan amusements by the infamous mission of Letzel, unconscious of the approaching earthquake, regarding the discontent of one German monk as something that might—it mattered not which of the two—be hushed at the stake or silenced by the sop of a fat benefice." The very greatness of the evil brought a reaction, and thoughtful men endeavoured to stay the general corruption by revived religious conviction. But the attempt failed through two causes. The one was the timidity expressed in the saying attributed to Cardinal Pole, that men "ought to content themselves with their own inward convictions, and not concern themselves to know if errors and abuses existed in the Church." The other was the irreformable character of the Roman Court. Meanwhile, let the causes have been what they may, this Pagan tendency was remarkably kept in check in England, though signs of it appeared all through from Chaucer to Shakespeare. Signs—but only on the surface: none of the great

[3] The third cause of the cry for reformation lay in the tremendous sense of responsibility which rests on the reason and conscience of individuals with reference to their belief, and the necessity which they feel rests upon them of personal faith in, and personal communion with, the Lord. The other causes live in the outward world, this dwells in each man's soul. It was a mark of Western theology, as contrasted with Eastern, that whereas the latter loved to meditate upon God and upon the Christian doctrines as defined in the Creeds, the Western Church contemplated more practically the great phenomena of human nature and the relation of the soul to God. And Christian anthropology, it has been well said, "ranged itself under two heads—the objective one of the Sacraments and ordinances of the Church as such; and the subjective one of the progress of grace in the heart of each one of us" [Foulkes's Divisions of Christendom]. The mediæval divines had mainly concerned themselves with the former of these two heads, though not exclusively so, for the "Friends of God" and the Mystics had eagerly inculcated personal earnestness in religious life. But, taken as a whole, mediæval Christianity was preeminently the sense of corporate membership, and an exaggerated idea of the value of a perfunctory discharge of routine and merely external duties; "the form of godliness without the power" was the result. This, probably more than anything else, honeycombed the Church with corruption. And this furnishes the key to the preaching of Luther and its mighty effect upon men. It was the passionate assertion of personal religion and individual responsibility.

The cry for reform, then, was general before the great Revolution appeared. By what method might it be looked for? That which most commended itself to the thoughtful men of those days was the convoking of a General Council. Attempts had been made, but in vain; and in 1460 Pope Pius II. forbade any attempt "to invoke the aid of Councils under pain of damnation." This seemed to close that door. Yet men hoped even against hope. Constitutional reform had taken strong hold in France. When Pagan Leo X. was succeeded by Adrian VI. men hoped again, especially when that Pontiff declared that "many abominations had existed for a long time, yea in the Holy See itself;" but he died after a brief pontificate, and the Roman Curia was confirmed in its resolution to resist all change. But Luther's preaching had by this time stirred the waters too profoundly to suffer any further stagnation. Men's hearts were moved to their very depths, and the cry for reformation was too universal to be put down. Two methods remained. The one

ment under individual leaders, the assertion of the rights of national Churches, as against Papal domination. The one marked the movement in Germany and Switzerland, the other in England. And this last was sought. It was a recurrence to the faith of the purest ages of the faith. In England everywhere, national synods had been held, and dealt with the heresies, errors, and abuses of national Churches, whether such heresies had grown up within or been brought from without. The method was an old one, revived, not a new one invented. See on the Articles, ch. i.]. Archbishop Warham wrote concerning these three of reform: "It is true a General Council, free and entire, would have been the best and most able for a gangrene spread so far and eaten so deep into the body. But what! should we have let this gangrene to endanger life and limb, than be cured in time by a physician of knowledge and a less able hand? No, to see since, if we had stayed and waited for a General Council, what manner of one we should have had, if any; for that at Trent was not free, nor general nor free. . . . And I doubt whether even that Council (such as it was) would have been called, if some national and national synods, under supreme authority, had not first set upon this great reformation, which I heartily wish might be as orderly and happily pursued as it now is. It was right Christian and good in itself, and may make no doubt but that as the Catholic Church would have reformed herself, had she been in all parts freed from man yoke, so while she was for the most part under that yoke of Rome was, if not the only, yet the greatest hindrance to reformation." Causes, it will be seen, affect the whole and may be observed in the history of reformation in each nation. The special causes which set the causes in operation are seen as we now glance through the history of each nation.

g.—On Oct. 31st, 1517, Luther's quarrel with the Church of Rome began, when he boldly attacked the doctrine of indulgences. This date has been kept in Protestant Germany as the beginning of the Reformation. Luther soon defended himself against the charge of heresy. The arguments which he advanced rested upon the supremacy of the Pope; e.g. one of these arguments was that "the Pope alone has power over those things which are of Faith," and the other was that "Christians are to be judged by the Church holds many things which are verities which yet are placed against the Canon of the Bible, nor among the ancient Fathers." Luther replied, following Augustine, that the canonical books of Scripture alone are an infallible guide. Luther was now led to inquire more fully into the authority of the Pope; consequently he was cited on Aug. 7th, 1518, to appear in Rome, to answer the charge of heresy. Eventually, however, his trial took place before the Papal Legate, Cardinal Cajetan, at Augsburg, on Oct. 10th. Luther persisted in renouncing the doctrine of indulgences, and denied the authority of Papal edicts when unsupported by Holy Scripture, the ancient Fathers, or the decisions of General Councils. He was ordered peremptorily to recant. Luther, however, fearing violence, escaped by night from Augsburg [Oct. 16th], and returned to Wittenberg. In July, 1519, an important theological debate took place at Leipzig, between Carlstadt (who had joined the new movement, but who eventually pushed his principles to such extravagant lengths that he was silenced by Luther) on the one side, and Eck, a very learned champion of the Papacy, on the other. During the debate Luther spoke, and advanced a step farther in his conflict with the Papal power. He denied [1] that the Latin Church is exclusively the Church of Christ; [2] that the ascendancy of the Pope of Rome was of Divine institution; [3] that the Councils of the Church are infallible. The result of this boldness was his excommunication by Pope Leo X. in June, 1520. The Papal Bull was publicly burnt at Wittenberg the same year. Luther at this time attracted many followers; among others, Martin Bucer—who subsequently took refuge in England and received a theological professorship at Cambridge—and Melancthon, a brilliant and earnest student at Wittenberg. In 1521, Melancthon drew up a text-book for Lutheran divines, entitled Loci Communes Rerum Theologicarum; it contained a calm statement of their special doctrines, supported by Scriptural proofs. Meanwhile, in 1520, Luther had appealed to the Christian potentates of the German nation to summon a Council for redressing grievances and removing abuses in the Church; and later in the same year he published The Babylonish Captivity of the Church, a violent treatise against the mediæval doctrine concerning the Sacraments: he reduces them in number from seven to two, and lays very great stress on the necessity of faith, without which the Sacraments convey no benefit. The prospect of his excommunication caused Luther to bring forward another doctrine of great importance, viz. that all Christians are the priests of God, quoting Rev. i. 6 and other texts in support. Henry VIII. replied to this by stating that for the same reason all Christians must be kings. Luther, however, used this doctrine for giving more importance to the laity, and for reducing the tyranny of the Papal priesthood. Luther's views were popular, and at length the Elector Frederic became an ardent champion of the Reformation movement. In 1521 Luther was summoned by the Emperor Charles V. to appear before the Diet at Worms. On this occasion he made his memorable stand, saying that unless he were convicted of heresy by the testimony of Scripture, he could not and would not retract anything, adding, "Here stand I, I can no farther; God help me. Amen." In spite of opposition, the Diet eventually proclaimed the Imperial bann against Luther as a heretic and outcast from the Church of God, and his writings were prohibited. On his way back to Wittenberg, he was secured by order of his friend and patron, the Elector of Saxony, and carried off to a safe shelter in the Castle of Wartburg. Here Luther worked actively with his pen, his most important work being the translation of the New Testament into the Saxon dialect. During Luther's retirement, some of the Reformers, headed by Carlstadt, had broken out into extravagances, and many sympathisers had in consequence shrunk from throwing in their lot with the Reformers. At this period, too, the fanatical and lawless sect of the Anabaptists had started into birth. Luther, in consternation, reappeared at Wittenberg on March 7th, 1552, to save his work from destruction; he silenced the ultra-Reformers, undid their work, and in his own teaching laid great stress on the necessity of Christian quietness and charity. The Peasants' War, in 1524, brought the Lutheran doctrines into fresh discredit; although Luther sternly denounced the insurgents, and preached obedience to the civil magistrate, still much of his influence was gone, owing to the revolutionary proceedings of fanatical Reformers. In this year, Erasmus, who had been an exceedingly able advocate of Reformation principles, went over to the opposite side, and violently attacked Luther and his teaching. The States of the Empire now formed themselves into religious leagues, either in opposition to or in defence of the new doctrines. The "League of Torgau" [1526] was constituted of those princes who supported reform; they agreed to stand by each other in case they were attacked "on account of the Word of God or the removal of abuses." The Diet of Spire, which opened immediately afterwards, recommended many reforms, such as allowing the clergy to marry [Luther had already married an escaped nun], restoring the chalice in the Eucharist to the laity, and that private masses should be abolished. The Emperor, however, refused his sanction to these reforms; whereupon the individual States took it upon themselves to work out their own reforms; so, in 1527, in Saxony, "visitors" were nominated by the Elector to examine into the condition of each parish; the visitors did not interfere with old institutions, provided they were not repugnant to Scripture; their motto was to reform and correct, not to destroy and abolish. The Reformation, however, received a check at the new Diet of Spire, which assembled in 1529. The reforming edict of the former Diet [1526] was repealed; the Emperor was angry and intolerant. The Reformers hereupon drew up their protest against these proceedings, and so obtained for themselves and their posterity the name of "Protestants." Their influence, however, was now much weakened by internal divisions. A new set of Reformers, headed by Zwingli, and opposed to the Lutherans in their opinions as to the Sacraments and other doctrines of the Gospel, arose in parts of southern Germany and in Switzerland. The Conference of Marburg was held in 1529, in order to bring about an understanding between the two sets of Reformers, but without success. At this conference the Lutherans drew up and agreed upon fifteen dogmatic definitions; these were revised and increased to seventeen at the Conference of Schwabach [Oct., 1529], and subscription to them became a necessary condition of membership in the league of Reformers referred to previously. These seventeen articles were finally revised by Melancthon, and were incorporated in the celebrated Confession of Augsburg—an apology for Lutheranism, presented to the Emperor Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg [1530]. The Confession is remarkably clear and outspoken, but humble and modest in tone. In setting forth the articles of the Lutheran Reformed Faith, it was seen that the Reformers held almost everything in common with the Catholic Church; for the errors and abuses which they rejected they gave their reasons, taken from Scripture and the early Fathers of the Church. After the Lutheran views had been discussed, the Diet, with threats, ordered the Reformers to conform in all things to the established usage of the Roman Church. Owing to these threats the Reformers entered into a covenant, called the "Schmalkaldic League" [1531], by which they agreed to help each other for six years in defending their Faith. They also sought the aid of France against their own Emperor—a fatal and unpatriotic thing to do. Charles V. was now glad to pacify the Protestant Reformers, in order to concentrate his forces against the Ottoman Turks, who were attacking his dominions. Accordingly the Peace of Nuremberg was signed [July, 1532], by which it was agreed that the present state of things was to continue until a "General Free Council" could authoritatively settle the matters in dispute. Pope Paul III. attempted to call a Council at Mantua in 1537, but the Lutherans could not regard it as a free Council, so the attempt failed. The Lutherans then issued a manifesto, embodying their principles, and called the "Schmalkaldic Articles," because issued by the Protestant League of that name [1537]. At the same time the Emperor, his brother Ferdinand, and many powerful princes, themselves into "the Holy League," propose of opposing the Reformation. the Colloquy of Ratisbon was held champions of the Reformed and ed Faith, and although an agree- nearly arrived at, yet in the end ers in dispute were in the same as before. The Reformed s to go through another terrible ordeal

—the Thirty Years' War [1618-48]—before it was finally recognised and supported by the German Government, by the peace of Westphalia [1648].

The Reformation spread through the following States in the German Empire:—

The Electorate of Saxony, the starting-place of the movement, and where as early as 1527 the majority of the people embraced the Reformed Faith.

Ducal Saxony yielded in 1539, Leipzig, Dresden, and other chief towns joining the movement.

Hessen, under Philip, eagerly received Lutheran doctrines in 1526.

Lüneburg joined in 1527; Scriptural preaching was enforced, but ritual and worship remained much as before.

Mecklenburg, Holstein, and Pomerania also were among the first to join.

A few years later, in 1535, Württemberg and other minor States joined the Protestant League.

Frederic, Elector Palatine, and his people, took the same side in 1546.

In the Duchy of Bavaria, the Reformation made much progress at first among the people, but owing to the opposition of the civil power, and to the efforts of the Jesuits, Lutheranism was extinguished in the duchy before the century closed.

In East Friesland and in Silesia Lutheranism had a peaceful triumph about the year 1527.

The rapid spread of the movement in Germany was almost entirely owing to the influence of Luther; in 1523 he is said to have issued as many as 183 books or pamphlets in promoting the cause; his writings were perfectly clear and practical, and adapted to influence the people. The force of his arguments, his homely illustrations, his simple boldness, and especially his deep earnestness, completely won the people, and made them ardent champions of the Reformation. Melancthon's influence, though of a different nature, was also very great in forwarding the movement; his learned lectures at the University of Wittenberg were the means of raising up many able coadjutors in the work of Reformation; but the Lutherans were chiefly indebted to Melancthon for the Confession of Augsburg and other symbolical writings containing systematic statements of Lutheran doctrines; by these the truth, after it had been discovered, was preserved and kept intact for themselves and their posterity. He died in 1560. The masses of the people, however, were probably most influenced by the itinerant friars who went from village to village, and town to town, preaching the doctrines of Luther.

Eastern Prussia received Lutheran preachers

in 1523, and George Polentz, one of the Prussian Bishops, embraced the Lutheran doctrines, and promoted the Reformation. In 1525 the whole country was converted. A German Liturgy, adhering as much as possible to ancient usage, was introduced. Convents were converted into hospitals, and for the instruction of the clergy, Postils, or explanatory sermons on the Epistles and Gospels, were regularly sent from Wittenberg. In 1548 the Reformers were aided by a large influx of Bohemian Protestant refugees, and so became independent of aid from Wittenberg.

Polish Prussia became reformed about 1560, Sigismund Augustus being their sovereign.

In Denmark Lutheranism was first taught at Wiburg, in Jutland, by John Tausen, who had studied under Melancthon at Wittenberg. Lutheran preachers came in 1526. When Frederick I. was crowned King of Denmark [1523], the Danish hierarchy required him to extirpate the "heretics of Luther's school." Hence the King, though personally favourable to reform, was unable to advance the work immediately; but in 1526 he passed over to the side of the Reformers, and in 1527, at a Diet held at Odense, "liberty of conscience" was granted to both parties. In 1530 the Danish Protestants issued a manifesto at Copenhagen similar to the Augsburg Confession, holding fast to all Lutheran doctrines. Christian III., who succeeded his father on the throne in 1533, was an ardent Reformer; he had attended the Diet at Worms [1521], and had listened with admiration to Luther. The Reformation now spread throughout the whole of Denmark, bishops were deposed, and twelve Superintendents established in the ancient Sees. In the University of Copenhagen three Divinity professors were appointed to lecture on the Old and New Testament and on the Fathers. A Danish liturgy was compiled on Lutheran models. Christian III. joined the Protestant League in 1538. The Confession of Augsburg was accepted by Denmark in 1569.

Norway and Iceland, after brief struggles, gave in their adherence to Lutheranism about 1539.

All these countries have remained Lutheran to the present day.

Sweden. — Students from Wittenberg had brought Lutheranism into Sweden in 1519. Gustavus Vasa, crowned in 1523, supported the Reformers in his kingdom. Accordingly when Brask, Bishop of Linköping, began a persecution of "the heretics," the King interfered on their behalf. In 1524 a Council was called to prepare the Church for the changes that were to be made by the Court. The King constituted himself supreme in matters ecclesiastical, appointed and deposed bishops on his own authority, seized a large part of the ecclesiastical revenues, suppressed monasteries, and organised the Church much on the same model as the Reformed Church in Denmark. He advocated the use of nearly all the ancient service books and ritual, until the people were better instructed; and this course was adopted by the clergy at the Synod of Örebro in 1529. One great characteristic of the Reformed Church of Sweden is that the government of the Church by bishops has been preserved and perpetuated to the present day. Lawrence Peterson, a moderate Lutheran, was made Archbishop of Upsala. In 1539, however, the King threatened to constitute the Swedish Church on the Presbyterian model, but the threat was not accomplished. In 1544 the Reformation changes were established throughout the kingdom. These changes, however, led to an insurrection among the poorer classes, urged on in several cases by the Romish priests [1537-1543]. The insurrection was quelled, but another reaction occurred in 1576, when King John introduced a new liturgy, based on the missal authorised by the Council of Trent; it was adopted by the Diet in 1577, two Bishops strongly protesting against it, viz., Linköping and Strengness; the King moreover entrusted the management of a college at Stockholm to certain Jesuits whom he had invited from Louvain. But when Lutheranism was just at its lowest ebb, the King suddenly changed his course; the Jesuits were compelled to leave the country, and Lutheranism regained the ground it had lost. At the kirk-mote held at Upsala in 1593, the Augsburg Confession was adopted by Sweden; the followers of Zwingli and Calvin were denounced, the Romanising liturgy of King John was revoked, and the service book of Lawrence Peterson took its place. Luther's short catechism became also the recognised manual of instruction.

Poland. — Sigismund I., King of Poland from 1548 to 1572, tolerated Lutheranism, and during his reign it penetrated among all classes. Large numbers of Protestant refugees from Bohemia came to Poland in 1548, and aided in spreading the Lutheran doctrine. An ecclesiastical synod held at Piotrkow in 1551 advocated the most bitter persecution of the Protestants. On the other hand, the Polish Diet in 1552 was favourable to them. The Protestant Reformers, however, were greatly weakened by the desertion of their champion, Orichovius, formerly a student at Wittenberg, who rejoined the Roman Church in 1559. After Sigismund's death, most of the succeeding kings favoured the Romanists. Stephen Bathori came to the throne in 1571 and proclaimed himself favourable to religious toleration, saying that God had reserved to Himself the government of men's consciences. He was, notwithstanding, a patron of the Jesuits, and winked at their persecution of the Protestants. He was succeeded by Sigismund III. [1587-1632], Crown Prince of Sweden, whose parents had resisted Protestantism in Sweden. In this reign Protestantism is Poland was completely overthrown. This result was brought about partly by the Jesuits and partly by serious divisions among the Reformers themselves. The cause of the Reformers was also greatly weakened by some of their number adopting the Anti-Trinitarian heresy.

Bohemia and Moravia.—The followers of John Huss, the great Bohemian Reformer, entered into negotiations with Luther in 1519. In Feb., 1520, Luther writes, after reading the works of John Huss, that "I, without being conscious of it, have both taught and held all the things of John Huss . . . in brief we are all Hussites without knowing it." An alliance was soon formed between the Bohemians and Lutherans. In 1532 the Bohemians, with the sanction of Luther, presented a formal statement of their tenets to George, Margrave of Brandenburg, followed in 1535, by a regular "Confession of Faith to Ferdinand, King of Bohemia." At the breaking out of the religious war in 1546, the country sent an army to aid the Protestants; after the disastrous battle at Mülberg [April 24th, 1547], they were subject to severe persecution. Many were ordered to leave their country within six weeks, and a thousand of them settled in Prussia [1548]. The Jesuits began to work against them in 1552. The three divisions of Protestants, viz. Lutheran, Swiss, and Bohemian Brethren, now united and presented the Confession of their Faith to Maximilian II. in 1575, and again to Rudolph II. in 1608. In 1609 perfect religious equality was granted to them, but it was soon withdrawn. The Jesuits were successful in once more getting rid of Protestantism in 1627, when Ferdinand II., a former pupil in their school, rigorously banished all who held fast to the Reformed Faith. Many fled to Moravia and formed the nucleus of the Moravian Church, which continues to this day. Protestantism subsequently revived in Bohemia, and in 1781 Joseph II. issued in its behalf the Edict of Toleration. There are now about 100 Protestant congregations in the country, the majority of them belonging to the Swiss or Calvinistic division of Reformers.

Hungary and Transylvania.—As early as 1521 we find traces of Protestantism in these countries, for in that year George Szákmáry, Archbishop of Grán, ordered a condemnation of Luther's books to be read from the pulpits of the principal churches. Severe edicts against Lutheranism were issued in 1523 and 1525. But, in spite of these, the Reformation triumphed in several towns and districts; students who had been sent to Wittenberg returned and taught the Lutheran doctrines. In 1527 King Ferdinand I. complained that even Anabaptists and Zwinglians were gaining ground. Monks and nuns were driven from their cloisters. In 1533 John Honter, on his return from Switzerland, established a printing office at Cronstadt for publishing Protestant teaching. About the same time a Magyar translation of the New Testament by Matthew Devay, a former pupil at Wittenberg, appeared. He was called the Luther of Hungary. Eventually he joined the Swiss school of Reformers [about 1544], and was followed by the great majority of Hungarian Protestants. They drew up their Confession of Csenger in 1557, and it still remains their standard of orthodoxy. In Transylvania the majority of the Reformers were Lutheran; religious liberty was granted to them in 1557. It is said that only three families of the magnates then adhered to the Pope, the nobility were nearly all reformed, and the people thirty to one in favour of the new doctrine; but owing to divisions, and the heresy of the Anti-Trinitarians, the Jesuits regained a great part of the country [1579–1588]. In the latter year, however, the Jesuits were forcibly expelled. After a further reaction under Rudolph II., full religious liberty was secured by the treaties of Nikolsburg [1622] and Linz [1645].

Spain.—Luther's writings were circulated in Spain as early as 1520, and converts were made in great numbers, especially in Seville and Valladolid. But the cruelties of the Inquisition successfully extirpated Protestantism from the country, and in 1570 hardly a trace of it remained. The accession of Philip II. in 1559, "the Nero of Spain," had made its destruction only a matter of time. Among the more prominent of Spanish Reformers were two brothers, Juan and Alfonso de Valdés, Rodrigo de Valero, Egidius, Domingo de Rojas, and Dryander, who published a Castilian translation of the New Testament in 1543, and in 1548 took refuge in England, and was made Professor of Greek at Cambridge.

Italy.—Lutheranism between the years 1530 and 1542 made good progress in different parts of the country, e.g. in the Duchy of Ferrara, where Calvin and other Reformers took refuge about 1535; in Naples, where Juan de Valdés was Spanish Secretary; throughout the Republic of Venice, in Modena, Milan, Lucca, and other places, and even at Bologna in the Papal States. But in 1542, Cardinal Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV., brought the cruelties of the Inquisition to bear upon the Protestants, and quickly exterminated them. Two of the principal Reformers, Bernardino Ochino and Peter Martyr, an able scholar, and formerly Canon of the Augustinians, took refuge in England in 1547. Ochino was made a Prebend of Canterbury, and Peter Martyr, Professor of Divinity at Oxford. At the accession of Queen Mary, in 1553, both fled from England and took refuge at Zürich. Ochino was subsequently accused of advocating Anti-Trinitarianism and polygamy.

Switzerland.—The Reformation in Switzerland was commenced under the leadership of Huldreich Zwingli, born in 1484, seven weeks after the birth of Luther; he, too, like Luther, was educated for the priesthood, being ordained in 1506. In 1513 he began to devote himself to the study of the Bible, and especially to the New Testament, in order, as he says, that he might draw the doctrine of Christ direct from the fountain; he did not place much value on the writings of the Fathers, but looked forward to a time when "Divine Scripture alone would be precious among Christians." Unlike Luther, he had no reverence for ancient uses and traditions of the Church, and abolished as far as he could every such use not specially mentioned in the New Testament. He came into contact with, and was greatly influenced by Erasmus in 1514 and following years. His first efforts at reform began in 1517; when at Einsiedeln he exerted himself to abolish image-worship and other corruptions. In 1519 he was appointed to a preachiership at Zürich, and here he soon took a commanding position, his talents and force of character being very conspicuous. It was his custom to explain the Scriptures to his people, instead of reproducing the mediæval interpretations of them; he is said also to have done a good work in purifying the morals as well as the worship of the citizens. In 1519 we find him successfully resisting the disgraceful sale of Indulgences. The Papal authorities evidently wished to retain Zwingli on their side. For this purpose the Pope, Leo X., granted him a pension of fifty gulden, and made him one of his Chaplains in 1518. Pope Adrian also wrote him a cajoling letter. But in 1522 the Bishop of Constance formally accused the Zwinglians of disobedience, in breaking the fasts of Lent; public opinion, however, was now entirely on the side of Zwingli, and the Bishop's action was futile. Zwingli about this time married, against the law of the Church; he kept his marriage secret, however, till 1524. In 1523 a sweeping change was effected in Zürich, the authority of the Bishop was destroyed, the ancient liturgy was swept away, the Mass was reduced to a memorial, and the monasteries were converted into schools. The Bishop of Constance and several cantons, including Lucern, Freyburg, and Zug, protested in vain at these changes:—Zwingli's ascendancy was now complete. Meanwhile, the Reformation had been making headway in Basle. Its chief author was Œcolampadius, a friend of Melancthon and Erasmus; he was made a preacher in the cathedral of Basle in 1515, where he set forth the Reformed opinions; in 1522 he allied himself to Zwingli. The Bishop and his party opposed the movement, but the Senate asserted the supremacy of the Bible and permitted disputations to be held, in which many Papal doctrines were openly attacked [1524]. The canton of Berne was disposed to follow in the footsteps of Zürich and Basle. In 1526 a general assembly of twelve Swiss cantons was held at Baden, and the Zwinglian doctrines condemned by a majority of nine out of the twelve cantons. Yet the Reformation, in spite of this severe check, still continued to make way. The hatred, however, between the opposing parties culminated on the battlefield of Cappel, where Zwingli was slain [1531] and his followers routed. Zwingli's teaching in regard to Original Sin, the Sacraments, and Predestination was at variance with all other branches of the Church. With regard to Christian Baptism, he represented it as standing on the same level with John's baptism—merely a sign; yet at the Conference of Marburg, in 1529, he signed the statement of the Lutherans that baptism is not "a naked sign, but a work of God, by which we are regenerated." Hence Luther considered him guilty of dishonesty and insincerity.

The death of Zwingli was closely followed by that of Œcolampadius; but the work of reformation was carried on by two able successors, Henry Bullinger and Oswald Myconius: the latter, a bosom friend of Zwingli, had been forcibly expelled from Lucern in 1522. Another prominent Reformer was William Farel, a refugee from France, who was very successful at Berne, Neuchâtel, Basle, and especially in Geneva, where he brought about the overthrow of the Papal power in 1535. But a far greater leader now appeared on the scene in the person of John Calvin; in him began the second generation of Reformers. Born in 1509, at Noyon, in Picardy, he was originally destined for holy orders, but eventually devoted himself to jurisprudence at Orleans and Bourges Universities. He first began the work of reformation in Paris, but some of the more violent and indiscreet Reformers there having posted up anti-Papal placards, he fled to Basle in October, 1534. It is remarkable that although Calvin was unusually severe in his general character, yet he was deficient in Christian heroism, and describes himself as being "naturally timid, and of a soft and faint-hearted disposition."

At Basle Calvin drew up, in 1536, his Institutes of the Christian Religion, which quickly became the text-book for Calvinists generally. In it are contained all his distinctive doctrines. Calvin succeeded in getting his principles adopted in Lausanne this same year. But in Geneva the people rebelled against the severity of his discipline, and both he and Farel were banished in 1538. He was invited to return, however, and he did so in 1541, thenceforth exercising despotic power. He established a consistory, consisting of twelve lay elders and six ministers, Calvin himself presiding, and exercising a controlling influence. To this body was entrusted the jurisdiction over the religion of the whole community, together with power of excommunication. The sessions of this tribunal were marked by severity and severity; in 1553, by its severity, a heretic was burnt for heresy. In 1555, it brought about the religious union of the cantons of Switzerland by the Consensus Tigurinus, and so consolidated the Reformation. By this Consensus, Catholics and Protestants are treated as much more equal outward signs, as Zwingli treated them. Calvin spoke of them as "organs" of God for conferring grace; but not of the benefits of the Sacraments. Calvin died in 1564, and was succeeded by Beza, who continued for a long time the standard of Geneva. But a powerful reaction began under Leo de Smedt, Archbishop of Milan, a man learned, and devoted to the Church of Rome. The Jesuits were busy in different parts of the country, and in 1586 the Romanists declared themselves into "The Golden League" to resist the Calvinists, and at the beginning of the next century the Calvinists lost more ground, owing to the influence of the Duke of Savoy, and the titular of Geneva, François de Sales. Peace was not concluded till after the battle of Marston, 1712.

The earliest Reformer in France was Lefèvre, who in 1512 was elected Bishop of Meaux, in the diocese of that diocese, both men declared that the Papal religion was not a true form of Christianity. The Theological Faculty of Paris, the Sorbonne, having previously condemned Luther's writings, began the work of the French Reformers. The Emperor Francis I., professed to be neutral, but took no measures to pacify the perpetual savage massacres of the Protestants. In 1534 Calvin and others fled from France; in 1545 the towns of Merindol and Nantua, with twenty-eight villages, were destroyed, as many as 4,000 Protestants slain. In spite of all this, the Reformation had increased in importance in France. Francis I. was succeeded by his son Henry II., who married Catherine de' Medici, niece of Pope Clement VII. During her reign the persecution went on with greater severity; but, nothing was accomplished. The Reformers in Paris organised in 1555, as a distinct congregation, the Calvinistic discipline of Geneva, and they issued their first Confession at this time was divided into two parties, one headed by the Dukes of Guise, the other by the Bourbon family. The Guises now allied themselves with the Catholics, or Huguenots, as they were called, and the Guises became the enemies of the Roman Catholics. The two parties were inspired with mutual hatred of each other. In 1560 a Huguenot conspiracy to rid the kingdom of the Guises was discovered; the chief mover was Geoffrey de la Barre, a friend of Calvin. On the other hand, the Cardinal of Lorraine tried to force every Frenchman, at the peril of his life, to sign a creed, drawn up by the Sorbonne, and which he called the "Huguenots' rat-trap." A conference between the two parties took place at Poissy in 1561, Theodore Beza and Peter Martyr representing the Huguenots; but no good result followed. By this time the Huguenots had greatly increased in the country, and were being continually aided by disciples of Calvin sent from Geneva; in January, 1562, they were granted religious liberty, but shortly afterwards the massacre of several of their number at Vassy rekindled the strife, and civil war broke out. The Huguenot leaders were the Prince of Condé and Admiral de Coligny. At the battle of Dreux [Dec., 1562] the Huguenots were routed; immediately afterwards the Duke of Guise was assassinated by a fanatical Huguenot. Peace was concluded at Orleans, and the Pacification of Amboise [March, 1563] secured a certain amount of religious liberty to the Huguenots. A second religious war raged from 1567-70. At the battle of Jarnac [1569] the Prince of Condé was taken prisoner, and subsequently assassinated. The Peace of St. Germain-en-Laye was concluded in 1570, by which the Huguenots were to be free to worship in their own way; but in 1572, by an act of gross treachery, under the guidance of Catherine de' Medici, a massacre of the Huguenots was planned, and carried out under circumstances of great atrocity on St. Bartholomew's Day [1572]. Over twenty thousand Protestants were murdered in different parts of France, among them Admiral Coligny. The Calvinists rose again, and the Guise family entered into an alliance with Philip II. of Spain in order to extirpate Protestantism. But in 1589 the Protestant Prince, Henry of Navarre, came to the throne as Henry IV. Four years later, in order to stop further bloodshed, Henry IV. renounced Protestantism; perfect religious liberty, however, was granted to the Huguenots by the "Edict of Nantes" [1598], solemnly declared to be perpetual and irrevocable. But the despotism of Richelieu and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. in 1685 overthrew the Reformation in France.

Netherlands.—The country had been prepared for the Reformation [1] by the cruelties of the Spanish Inquisition, which had aroused hatred to the Papal power; [2] by the writings of Erasmus, a native of Rotterdam, exposing the vices of the age in 1500; [3] by the writings of Luther. The Emperor Charles V., born at Ghent in 1500, was lord of these provinces, and mercilessly persecuted all who held the "new opinions;" in 1521

he issued an edict against the writings of Luther, "whether in Latin, Flemish, or any other modern language." The first two martyrs suffered at Brussels in 1523, whereupon Luther wrote his Epistle to the Christians in Holland and Brabant. In 1525 converts abounded, and executions became fearfully numerous, the victims during Charles's reign being reckoned by thousands, among them being the Englishman, William Tyndall, who, in 1536, was put to death at Vilvorde, near Brussels; he had translated the New Testament into English in 1525, and had also exerted great influence in Belgium. These measures not succeeding, Charles V. introduced the terrors of the Inquisition to subdue Protestantism [in 1550]. Philip II., who succeeded his father in 1560, carried on the work of persecution. Many troubles came upon the Reformers, owing to their being confounded with the fanatical and lawless Anabaptists, who abounded in the country; so in 1562 they drew up The Belgic Confession, containing the doctrines of their Faith. This Confession is based on The Confession of the French Reformers, and so is distinctly Calvinistic. In 1566 the Belgic Confession was ratified at a Synod of Reformers, held at Antwerp. Meanwhile the continued persecution was exasperating all classes against the Government. At length, when the Duke of Alva, at the head of a Spanish army, renewed the massacres, the Protestants took the field under the Prince of Orange, Philip van Marnix, and many other nobles, in 1568. A desperate struggle ensued, ending in the independence of Holland in 1579, the seven northern provinces separating from the remaining ten. In 1581 the Roman religion was forbidden in the new kingdom, and Protestantism had triumphed in every quarter, aided materially by the Protestant University of Leyden. The neighbouring provinces, under the Spanish Duke of Parma, entered into an agreement at Arras, in 1579, to help in counteracting the Reformation; and this, coupled with the aid of the Jesuits, finally caused the Papacy to be re-established in a great part of the country.

England.—It has been thoughtfully said that the downfall of the Papal power in England began from the shameful day when the miserable King John laid his crown at the feet of Cardinal Pandulph, and shocked the sense of the English nation by that shameful enormity. From that time a reaction against Papal tyranny began, and the history of the Plantagenet Kings is continually marked by struggles between Papal tyranny and national independence. The growth of intelligence and piety in the English Universities, as witnessed in the lives of such men as Dean Colet, Sir Thomas More, Linacre, and others, was another factor in the great movement. Erasmus had visited Oxford in 1497, and was Professor of Greek at Cambridge in 1505–1508. The immediate occasion of the breach was the quarrel between VIII. and Pope Clement VII. concerning the King's divorce, which resulted, in the overthrow of the Pope's authority in England. Henry had already assumed the title of "Supreme Head of the Church of England," and the Convocations of Salisbury and York had acknowledged this with this limitation, "so far as may be consistent with the law of Christ" [1531]. Further appeals to Rome were forbidden. A Court of Delegates appointed by the Pope was the ultimate Court of Appeal in ecclesiastical cases. Thus far the bishops and clergy had accepted the change, but beyond this neither they nor the King seemed to contemplate any reform of doctrine or manners. Henry VIII. remained attached to the mediæval system until his death. Although he suppressed monasteries, it was not done to benefit the Church, but to meet his own requirements. So far from being a Reformer, he was the great obstacle to the progress of Reformation. Cranmer, who had been made Archbishop of Canterbury for espousing the King's cause in the matter of his divorce, was still a believer in the doctrine of Transubstantiation. In 1534 the Convocation of Canterbury issued the Ten Articles of Religion, retaining all the old doctrines, but cutting away flagrant abuses connected with them. The sermon at the opening of the Convocation was preached by Latimer, Bishop of Worcester, who afterwards was one of the most prominent of the Reformers. In 1535 an English translation of the Bible was presented by Cranmer to Henry VIII.; a Bishops' Book, or The Institution of a Christian Man, was issued. But from this time an Anti-Reforming party, headed by George Bishp of Winchester, and Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, gained the upper hand, and siding with them. Thus, in 1539, the "Six Articles" were enacted for the uniformity of opinion. They enforced by law: [1] Transubstantiation. [2] Communion in one kind. [3] Celibacy of the clergy. [4] Absolute obligation of vows of chastity. [5] Private masses. [6] Compulsory confession. In 1543 an Act of Parliament was passed denouncing Tyndall's "false translation" of the Bible, and forbidding the printing of the New Testament in English to "any printers, artificers, prentices, journeymen, or men, husbandmen, and labourers." Cranmer, however, still managed to retain his influence with the King, and in 1541 and 1542 a new and purified form of the Sarum Breviary was issued for use in the Canterbury diocese. In 1544 a Litany in English was published by the Convocation, and preparations were made for a new service book in English. At the time of the King's death in 1547.

Protector, Somerset, supported the movement, though probably on selfish grounds. Royal injunctions were at once issued directing the clergy to provide one book of the whole Bible, of the largest volume, in English, within three months, and within twelve months, the Paraphrase of Erasmus, also in English, upon the Gospels; both of these being set up in churches for the use of parishioners. Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, refused to obey, and was committed to the Fleet [Sept. 25th, 1547]; he was deposed from his bishopric for nonconformity in 1551. The first act in Edward's reign legalised communion in both kinds. The first book of Homilies also appeared this year, for the instruction of ignorant preachers and their flocks. Meanwhile a Committee of Divines, under Archbishop Cranmer, was engaged in compiling Service Books in English. In 1548, they produced an English Order of the Communion, and shortly afterwards The Book of Common Prayer, which came into general use on Whitsunday, 1549. Bonner, Bishop of London, refused to adopt its use, and was deprived, Sept. 21, 1549. This book was compiled from the old Offices; it retained all the traditions and sentiments of the past that were not considered wrong in themselves. The compilers sought to restore the worship of the Church to the model of the early Church, before the rise of mediæval errors. On this account the book was obnoxious to many ultra-Reformers, especially to John Knox, who had received a preachingship at Berwick-on-Tweed, and who was even offered the Bishopric of Rochester, in order to urge Cranmer on to a more violent Reformation.

The state of parties in England was now greatly affected by the arrival of a multitude of foreign Protestants in 1549. Bucer, a Lutheran, became Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr, a follower of Zwingli, at Oxford. John Hooper, also, who had retreated to Zürich in 1539, returned to England this year, an ardent and persistent advocate of Zwingli's views concerning the Sacraments; he refused to wear the vestments prescribed in the Prayer Book, and was committed to the Fleet, 1551. He soon complied, however, and was consecrated Bishop of Gloucester in the same year. All these sought to introduce much greater changes. Meanwhile Cranmer's views concerning the Eucharist had undergone a change; he had renounced Transubstantiation, and followed Calvin in believing a real, virtual, but not a corporal presence. Ridley, Bishop of London, held the same views; the result was that a second Prayer Book was introduced in November, 1552, with a few alterations in the Communion Service to suit the modified views, but the book still remained in accordance with the doctrines of the early Church. In 1553 a regular Confession of Faith of forty-two Articles was published, based upon the Confession of Augsburg of 1530, differing in one important point, viz. in the doctrine of the Eucharist, which followed Calvin's tenets.

The death of Edward VI., in July, 1553, and the accession of Queen Mary, threatened utter destruction to the Reformation. Mary had inherited from her mother, Catharine of Arragon, a thorough hatred of the Reformers' teachings. Immediately, therefore, the old Latin service-books were reintroduced; the Book of Common Prayer forbidden; the Romish doctrine of Transubstantiation reaffirmed by Convocation, five members only opposing it. This may be accounted for partly by the fact that the rapid changes during the latter part of the last reign under the influence of the foreign Reformers, and the extreme views of Hooper, had caused a reaction, and partly by the fact that the leading Reformers were silenced and imprisoned, including Bishops Coverdale, Hooper, Latimer, Cranmer, Ridley, Holgate of York, and Farrer of St. David's. Many more, reckoned at 800, fled from the country. Bishops Bonner, Tunstall, and Gardiner, who had been deprived in the last reign, were now restored to their Sees, and in 1554 England was once more brought under the supremacy of Rome, through the agency of Cardinal Pole. Meanwhile, some of the Reformers who had settled at Frankfort [1554] sought to reject the second Prayer Book on the ground of its being still superstitious. Calvin and Knox joined in condemning the book, but through the influence of Dean Cox in March, 1555, the English residents were ordered by the Senate of Frankfort to conform to the Prayer Book, whereupon the malcontents, under John Knox, retired to Geneva, and cut themselves off from the English Reformers. Far worse troubles were occurring in England. Mary, provoked by the violent language of some of the extreme Reformers, and by the insurrection under Wyatt, and influenced by her marriage with the bigoted Philip of Spain, began a most bitter persecution in 1555. As many as 288 persons are said to have been burnt for their religion, including Cranmer, and four other bishops, Hooper, Farrer, Ridley, and Latimer. Cranmer, after being induced by disgraceful artifices to make a recantation, was executed at Oxford [March 21st, 1556], holding fast to the Reformed Faith. Cardinal Pole was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury on the following morning; but both he and the Queen died in November, 1558. The mistaken policy of persecution had destroyed any chance the Papal Supremacy might have had in England. The death of Mary was felt as a relief, and the accession of Elizabeth hailed with joy.

Elizabeth's first efforts were directed to quieting religious controversy and strife. A Royal order, dated Dec. 27th, 1558, silenced all pulpits. In 1559, the acts of the late reign in reference to religion were all repealed, and the Royal Supremacy once more established, the Queen, however, refusing the title of "Supreme Head," preferring to be called "Supreme Governor." The Prayer Book, revised by Edmund Guest, Bishop of Rochester, was reissued on June 24th. A few of the changes in the second book of Edward VI. were omitted or modified, and the whole book was brought more into conformity with the first book of Edward VI. With one exception—Kitchen, Bishop of Llandaff—all the Marian bishops refused to take the Oath of Supremacy to Queen Elizabeth, and were deprived of their Sees. Matthew Parker was duly consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth by Bishops Barlow, Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkin; the remaining bishoprics were filled by Reforming prelates. When Convocation assembled in 1562 the Forty-two Articles of Edward VI. were remodelled and reissued as the Thirty-nine Articles in their present form. New troubles now began to vex the Reformed Church. The refugees, some of whom we saw quarrelling among themselves at Frankfort, 1554, now flocked back to England, many of them imbued with Genevan principles. On their arrival they immediately raised opposition to the Prayer Book, and the established customs of the Church, advocating a more radical reformation. The malcontents were nicknamed PURITANS [q.v.], and some of the more advanced of them separated themselves entirely from the communion of the Church [1567]; but owing to the firmness of Archbishop Parker, the doctrines and discipline of the Church, as it had been established, were preserved intact.

A second separation began in 1570, when the Romanists, on the arrival of Pope Pius V.'s Bull of Excommunication, cut themselves off from the Church of England. Shortly afterwards Romish plots and intrigues came to light, resulting in repressive measures being taken against Catholics. Executions became frequent, especially after Babington's plot to assassinate the Queen; and all their hopes were shattered by the destruction of the Spanish Armada in 1588. As the Romanists declined, the Puritans increased in numbers and influence; but all their endeavours to model the Church after the fashion of the Reformed Churches on the Continent were frustrated by the firm rule of Archbishops Whitgift and Bancroft [1604]. Thus the Reformed Church of England has come down to us, not a new Church, but merely purged from distinctively Romish doctrine, and freed from Papal oppression. Cranmer, in all the changes that he made, continually appealed to the Word of God and the custom of the primitive Church as his authority. Unbroken ties of holy orders, the preservation of the ancient doctrines, organisation, and traditions of the Church, a Prayer Book compiled almost entirely of pre-Reformation materials, prove the present Reformed Church of England to be one and the same with the Church of Christ that had existed in this land at the earliest times.

Scotland.—Owing to the frequent wars between Scotland and France, the Reformation did not begin under auspices in Scotland, the French being employed to uphold the "old religion." Accordingly, when Patrick Hamilton, a student at the Protestant University of Marburg, in Hessen, returned to Scotland, he preached against the corruption of the Church, he was burnt at the stake. Yet after Hamilton's death the reformation rapidly spread, so rapidly that in 1560 the Scotch Parliament passed a severe Act requiring all who held "the damnable opinion of great heretic Luther." Many took refuge in England, as that country had in 1534, thrown off its allegiance to the Pope. The Papal Church in Scotland needed no reformation, and in 1541 an Act requiring clerics of every rank to wear themselves in habit and manners of a layman; and in 1543 the Parliament required all persons to have "a good and lawful translation" in English or Scotch, of the Bible. In 1545 Cardinal Beaton, "Wolsey of Scotland," an able and ambitious man, but guilty of the grossest immorality, began a bitter persecution. Among the victims was George Wishart, who was executed March 1st, 1546. This act caused the celebrated John Knox, a Reformer, to rebel against Rome, and his sympathy with the Protestants. Beaton was himself murdered on the following day, and Knox showed his sympathy by taking refuge with the murderers in the castle of St. Andrew's [April, 1547]. Knox capitulated to the French [July], was taken, with other prisoners, and detained there till February, 1548, and had been ordained to the priesthood after studying the writings of St. Augustine. His fiery and fearless temper roused the greatest hostility to the Church, and he was justly indignant at her many corruptions. He speaks of that Church as "the synagogue of Satan," and of the Pope as "the man of sin." Upon his release from Rouen, the Privy Council gave him a preaching licence at Berwick-on-Tweed, and in 1551 a royal licence. But on the accession of Queen Mary in 1553, Knox left England and went to Geneva, where for about five years he was in constant intercourse with Calvin. While in Scotland the Reformers, the Earl of Argyle, renounced "the corruption of Satan, with all the superstitious traditions and idolatry thereof," and formed themselves into what they called "the congregation of Jesus Christ" [1558], adopting their Liturgy the English Prayer Book of 1552. [In 1564 the English Liturgy was replaced by the Prayer Book used in the English at Geneva, and which had been the approval of Calvin.] Knox returned to Scotland on May 2nd, 1559, a thorough Calvinist. The violence of his preaching at once kindled the passions of the people to such a pitch that abbeys and churches were sacked, monuments destroyed, and many kindred acts of violence perpetrated. Knox lost no time in completing the work of reformation. A Protestant League was formed on May 31st, and began its work by decreeing the suspension of the Queen Regent, Mary of Guise. The Queen now placed herself at the head of the army, and troops were sent from France to assist her in subduing her disaffected subjects.

Knox and his party made a treaty with England, Feb. 27th, 1560. A religious reformation was only prevented by the death of Mary of Guise on June 10th. On Aug. 17th the "Confession of Faith" of the Protestants was adopted by the Scotch Parliament, and immediately afterwards Bills were passed abolishing the Mass and the jurisdiction of the Pope. The Reformers, considering themselves as exclusively the "Congregation of Jesus," felt it their duty to utterly to destroy all traces of the old religion, just as the Canaanites were driven out by the Israelites.

So not only old customs and traditions in worship and ritual, but Episcopacy was abolished in 1562, and "Superintendents" were appointed in their place. Two bishops, Alexander Gordon of Galloway and Robert Bothwell of Orkney, conformed to the new religion. In the midst of these changes Mary Queen of Scots returned from England.

but the Reformed Faith was so firmly established that she was powerless to prevent its progress.

Knox and his followers assailed her with harshness and severity, boldly calling her to renounce her idolatrous religion, and protesting against the Mass in her private presence.

Eventually she was forced to abdicate in 1567, partly on the ground that she was attempting to restore the old religion. It was then that the murders of Rizzio (the secretary, and also a pensioner of Mary) and of John Black, a learned man of mediævalism, on the same day at Holyrood Palace were committed to frustrate the intended persecution.

In January, 1572, the titles of "Archbishop" and "Bishop" were restored to the superintendents, but they were still only nominal names. In November of the same year Knox died. A further change took place when, under the influence of Andrew Melville, Presbyterianism was established in place of the nominal Episcopacy. In 1610, Episcopacy in its English form was established in Scotland, but only to be again rejected by the people in 1639. The last hopes of a reaction in Scotland had been extinguished with the execution of Mary Queen of Scots in 1587.

As regards Church government, the Reformation was entirely Calvinistic. and.—The Irish Parliament in 1537 rejected the Papal Supremacy at the instigation of Henry VIII., and accepted the Royal Supremacy in its place. A great part of the clergy, however, headed by Archbishop Cromer, of Armagh, remained faithful to the Pope. But as the Sees fell vacant English prelates were appointed in their place, favourable to the reform of the Church; very little, however, was done during Henry's reign beyond suppressing monasteries. Edward VI.'s first act enjoined communion under both kinds, in Ireland as well as in England. The first Prayer Book of Edward VI. was used for the first time on Easter Day, 1551, in Christchurch Cathedral, Dublin, George Browne being Archbishop; arrangements were made for the Prayer Book to be translated into Irish, and also into Latin, but the plan fell through. Archbishop Dowdall, who succeeded Cromer in 1543, was deprived for refusing to use the English Prayer Book [Oct., 1551], and henceforth the Archbishops of Dublin held the Primacy. In Mary's reign the Papal Supremacy was restored, and with it the mediæval ritual and doctrines. In 1554 Archbishop Dowdall, restored to his See, acting under a commission, deprived the Archbishop of Dublin and three other prelates favourable to the Reformation. In Elizabeth's reign, with two exceptions, the Irish bishops retained their Sees; but after 1570, the date of the Pope's Bull of Excommunication, rival bishops were nominated both by the Queen and the Pope. The Irish translation of the New Testament was not issued till 1602. In 1585 Bishop Walsh, of Ossory, was murdered in his house while engaged on the work. The degraded and ignorant state of the people, and of many of their ministers, was the great barrier which stood in the way of a general Reformation.

Reformed Dutch Church. [DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.]

Reformed Episcopal Church.—

In 1873 a meeting took place in America of members of various Protestant denominations, including one English Dean, to receive the Communion, which was administered by Dr. Cummins, Assistant-Bishop in the diocese of Kentucky. His brother Bishops immediately protested against what they considered a public recognition of schism and a blame-worthy laxity of opinions; whereupon he sent in his resignation, and assembled a meeting at New York, in the house of the Young Men's Christian Association. The result was the organisation of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Dec. 2nd, 1873. Bishop Cummins having severed his connection with the Episcopal Church of America, and consecrated fresh bishops of the new body, and become its first president, a statement was drawn up defining the position and doctrines of the sect. At the present time it has over a hundred clergymen, and has several parishes in the United States and Canada, and in England. In England, however, it is losing ground, owing to a division which has taken place.

Reform of the Church.—One mark of the increased interest of the nation in religious matters is the demand which has been made during recent years for Church reform. In 1885 a Committee of the Upper House of Convocation was appointed to consider this subject, and from their report we make the following extracts:—

The Committee are of opinion that the reforms which require immediate attention are five in number, viz.:—

[1] The removal of the varied evils and abuses connected with the sale of patronage, and, for further security against the appointment of unfit presentees, the increasing of the power of bishops to refuse institution in certain cases under specified limits and conditions.

[2] Simpler and more effectual methods of removing from the cure of souls incompetent, persistently negligent, and criminous clerks. It is also most desirable that the laws affecting sequestration of benefices should be further amended, so as to prevent the diversion of the income of the benefice from its original purpose to the payment of the debts of the incumbent.

[3] The correction, so far as may be found expedient and practicable, of existing anomalies in the endowments of the Church—a reform which we believe would largely help to meet the changed character of many localities, and the shifting of population to which some of the memorialists refer.

[4] The enlargement of Convocation by an increase in the number of the Proctors for the clergy, and the statutory concession to Convocation of increased freedom in the internal regulation of matters involving the efficiency of the Church, subject always to the supremacy of the Crown and the authority of Parliament.

[5] The assignment to the faithful laity of the Church of a more clearly defined share in the administration of its affairs.

In their comment on each of these heads, they anticipate in [1] the Archbishop's Bill on Patronage [PATRONAGE], and on [2] express the opinion that further steps are required beyond the Pluralities Acts recently passed [PLURALITIES], in order to the more easy removal of unworthy clergymen. As regards [3] they say:—"We note with satisfaction that no proposals have been brought before us for any equalisation of the official incomes of the clergy, but we are distinctly of opinion that steps should at once be taken to reduce existing anomalies, and to improve the incomes of benefices of small value, especially where the population is large. This, we believe, will be best effected by the formation of a large central fund raised by equitable taxation of ecclesiastical incomes. The principles for the formation of this fund already exist in the system of first fruits and tenths—a system which, it will be remembered, this House and the Lower House have proposed largely to modify, with the view of facilitating the retirement of aged and infirm incumbents, and effecting other salutary changes in the disposition of the funds of the Church." They make other suggestions as to LAY SERVICES and PAROCHIAL BOARDS, which will be found under those heads.

Refugees.—A name first applied to French Protestants who, during the Flea persecutions in 1569, and again after revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, were forced to leave their country and refuge in England and elsewhere. Since then it has been extended to all who leave their country in times of distress.

Regalia.—In early times the king of a country claimed the revenues of all see long as they remained vacant, and this was called regalia. We often read in history of the kings, when in want of money, purposely deferring the appointment of a bishop so that the revenues might be theirs, in order to prevent this scandal in England a promise was extracted from Henry II by Pope, that the custom should thenceforward be discontinued. In France the kings have claimed regalia for a much longer period, for we find Louis XIV. making laws for the strict carrying out of the custom. He was ordered by the Pope, Innocent XI., to discontinue it, but at that time Louis was strong enough to refuse to obey. A compromise was made by Innocent XII., and the question presently settled.

Regeneration ["a new birth" or "born again"].—The work of the Holy Spirit by which man's heart is changed. The new birth or regeneration is declared in the New Testament to be a new birth from above [Gr. anōthen], a quickening of the Spirit, a partaking of Divine nature, the formation of Christ in the heart. It is a passive work, and differs from conversion, which is the turning of a man to God by his own will; it comes from God alone, and is utterly out of the power of man to perform, since before regeneration he is in a state of spiritual inability. Regeneration is the work of God's grace, and completely changes the whole state of man. It is an instantaneous act, and thus differs from sanctification which is the progression of man towards perfection: it consists in an internal act, which is nevertheless visible in its effects, and the blessings of which can never be entirely lost. This view of regeneration, set forth by the Apostles, was almost lost sight of in the Middle Ages, and was regarded rather as the first stage of justification. Luther and Calvin approached more nearly to the orthodox view, but their followers did not lay enough stress on the progress of the soul after regeneration, and considered that justification by faith was the only thing necessary. Arndt and others did much to establish the right view concerning regeneration.

The word "regeneration" only occurs in the Scriptures [Matt. xix. 28: Tit. iii. 5]. In the former it has no relation to the doctrine. A controversy which arose

Church of England some forty years ago has almost died out, and this chiefly because it is felt that the dispute was more upon terminology than upon essentials. It was the question, whether Baptism is the means of regeneration. Probably now-a-days not merely Churchmen, but Christians of all denominations are nearer in reality than they might express in words. That the Church of England teaches the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration in her formularies is indisputable. The words are clear. As soon as the baptism has taken place, the minister says, "Seeing now, dearly beloved, that this child is regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Church." But the trouble arose from an interpretation being placed upon the word "regenerate" which it was not able or intended to bear. They who bring an infant to baptism do so in the belief that a blessing is to be looked for therein; that admission into visible covenant is of itself a gift from God. And all gifts of God must of necessity imply life. There is a covenanted means herein of moral and spiritual advancement, but a condition at the same time expressed of Christian duty. Thus Archbishop Sumner, the leader, in his day, of the Evangelical party, writes: "St. Paul intimates with clearness that the Christians he addresses were thus regenerate: as having 'put off the old man with his deeds;' and having become 'the temple of the Holy Ghost,' and 'the members of Christ;' as having 'the spiritual circumcision, and being buried with Christ in baptism;' as having 'received the spirit of adoption,' and as 'being washed, sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.' To the Galatians, 'bewitched,' as he says they were, 'that they should not obey the truth,' he still writes: 'Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptised into Christ, have put on Christ'" [Apostolical Preaching, page 91]. Such a view is no "magical conception of the Divine activity." It involves to the full the need of personal faith, issuing in holy living. The outward act is the act of obedience to a Divine command. The grace is the gift of God alone. And the words of the Baptismal Service which follow show that the Church of England holds no doctrine of opus operatum to the exclusion of the inward faith, which is necessary acceptance before God. A necessity of an inward change of heart and life is absolutely required. Even in the prayer which follows the act of baptism, the doctrine of renovation, distinguished from regeneration, is clearly pronounced. There the prayer is that the person now regenerate "may crucify the old man, and utterly abolish the whole body of sin, and proving that the Church does not regard it as comprised in the fact of regeneration. Furthermore he is to "continually mortify all his evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceed in all virtue and godliness of living."

Registers are required, by an Act of Henry VIII.'s Minister, Cromwell [A.D. 1536], to be kept, in every parish church, of the baptisms, marriages, and burials which have taken place. Books were ordered to be kept for the purpose at the expense of the parish, and entries made therein to be sent once a year to the bishop of the diocese. The method of keeping varied greatly at first, according to the idiosyncrasies of the clergy. Some of them neglected the duty altogether; some entered only the names of the persons baptised and buried, while others entered in the one case the names of the parents and in the other the occupation. Successive Acts of Parliament have altered this. Registers of baptisms are now required to give the name of the person baptised, the names, occupation, and residence of the parents and the officiating minister, as well as the time and place. In marriage registers the names and residences of the persons must be given, the time and place, names of witnesses and of the clergyman; and registers of burials give the name, age, and residence of the deceased.

All marriage registers are to be kept in duplicate marriage registry books. Certified copies of all registers of births and deaths are sent quarterly to the Registrar-General. At the general office in London indexes are kept of all the certified copies of the register, and every person is entitled, on payment of a fee, to search them, and have a certified copy. There are only eight register books known to exist prior to 1538. Beginning with that year, there are 812 registers in England. In 1599 an order came out that all existing registers were to be transcribed into parchment books. In a very few cases the originals and the copies are both found in the parish chest.

Registration.—The following are the rules for the registration of chapels:—[1] It must have been used as a place of public worship by the congregation requiring it to be registered during a year at the least preceding such registration. [2] If the building be one erected and used in lieu of some other building which has been previously registered, and subsequently disused as a place of worship, the registry of the disused building must be cancelled, whereupon the new building may be immediately registered in its stead.

Charles II. began the practice in 1672 by giving £600 per annum as a reward for the loyalty of the Presbyterians, and though afterwards discontinued, it was revived by William III., and George I., in 1723, still further augmented it in return for services rendered by the Presbyterians to the House of Brunswick. Relics [Lat. reliquiæ, "remains"] origi- nally meant the remains of saints and martyrs, which were cherished and revered by the Church; the term afterwards came to be used in a wider sense, to signify anything which had once belonged to the deceased person, or with which he had been in contact. The re- spect with which relics were regarded in- creased to adoration, and so great was the passion to possess them that the churches were filled with spurious relics, as the desire to ob- tain them blinded the eyes of enthusiasts, and laid them open to being defrauded. The Synod of Nicæa, 787, commanded that no churches should be consecrated which were not in pos- session of some relic, and the penalty was excommunication. Reverence to them was enjoined as a Christian duty; wonderful powers of healing or sanctification were attached to them; and every person thought it necessary to carry about a relic to preserve him from danger, and to make his prayers of greater effect. In Roman Catholic countries the worship of relics is still maintained, but they are expressly forbidden by the Church of England, and Luther says they are but "dead things which sanctify nobody."

Religion comes from the Latin, either, according to Cicero, from relegere, "to re- consider" or "read over"; or, according to Lactantius and others (which seems the more probable derivation), from religare, "to bind fast." The word is sometimes used as synony- mous with "sect"; but in a practical sense it is generally considered as the same with "godli- ness," or a life devoted to the worship and fear of God. Dr. Doddridge thus defines it: "Religion consists in the resolution of the will for God, and in a constant care to avoid whatever we are persuaded He would dis- approve, to dispatch the work He has assigned us in life, and to promote His glory in the happiness of mankind." The foundation of all religion rests on the belief of the existence of God. [GOD; INSPIRATION.] Religion has been divided into natural and revealed. These are discussed under NATURAL THEOLOGY and REVELATION. The religions which exist in the world are usually classified under four heads—Pagan, Jewish, Mahometan, and Christian—to the articles dealing with which the reader is referred.

Religious.—A term employed in England before the Reformation, and still in use upon the Continent, to designate persons who had devoted themselves to the monastic life. It is common to both sexes; but generally male religious are called monks or friars, and female, nuns or canonesses.

Religious Houses.—Houses set apart for the service of God; particularly those for the reception of monks, nuns, penitents, and others wishing to lead a religious life. All religious houses of this description were done away with in England at the Reformation, but the term is still in use in Roman Catholic countries.

Religious Liberty. [PERSECUTION; TOLERATION.]

Religious Orders. [MONASTICISM.]

Relly, James.—A Unitarian preacher, about the middle of the eighteenth century, who became the founder of the Universalists in London. His followers were known as Rellyanists, but the London society did not last long. Relly was a voluminous writer, a careful student of Scripture, and a good controversialist. His principal work is Union, or a Treatise of the Consanguinity and Affinity between Christ and His Church, in which he elaborates his doctrinal views, and shows the ground on which they rest. He said that Christ had made satisfaction for all the human race, and bore their sins in His body, so that he knew nothing of demanding justice on the sinner; and he maintained that the state of unbelievers after death cannot be a state of punishment, because Christ, who tasted death for every man, bore the chastisement of their peace. He admitted the doctrine of misery in a future state only so far that men in unbelief did not know what Jesus had done for them by the sacrifice of Himself, and, therefore, might be oppressed with guilt and fear; but he looked forward to a time of universal restitution, when all mankind would be brought to a knowledge of salvation. His earliest convert was John Murray, who had been a disciple of Whitfield; he, shortly after joining Relly, went to America, and there founded the UNIVERSALISTS [q.v.].

Remigius, SAINT.—The apostle and patron saint of the Franks, Bishop of Rheims [b. probably in 437; d. Jan. 13th, 533]. He became Bishop in 459, and converted and baptized Clovis, the first Christian King of France. Various fictions were invented concerning him, as, for instance, that, having no chrism ready for completing the baptism by confirmation, a dove from heaven brought him the consecrated oil in a vial or AMPULLA [q.v.], with which he anointed Clovis. He has left several letters, still extant, and was said by Sidonius Apollinarius to be one of the most eloquent men of his time. His name is retained among the black-letter saints of the Church calendar on Oct. 1st.

Remission [literally, "sending away"—Hence it is used to signify the remission of sentence of punishment, forgiveness, and absolution.

Remonstrants.—A name given Arminians, who, in 1610, presented a remonstrance to the States of Holland, comp. of the sentence of the Synod of Dort, had condemned them as heretics. A remonstrance was presented by the Cal. The Remonstrants were headed by Ep. and Grotius, and were for some time in England by Archbishop Laud, who afterwards altered his opinions.

Renaudot, EUSTACE, a learned O. lat., was born at Paris in 1646, educated by the Jesuits. The great with which he learnt and spoke languages attracted the eyes of the towards him, and he was sent by the several important missions to England etc. He also accompanied Cardinal to Italy in 1709, to a conclave held to Pope. Renaudot died in 1720. He much on the subject of the divis Christendom. His principal works: Proofs of the Eternity of Faith, against J. Aymon's Authentic Memoirs of the Religion of the Greeks; and Historical Alexandria Patriarchs, and Ecclesiastical Liturgies.

Repentance.—A term used: sorrow for sin which produces newness. The Greek word most frequently used in the New Testament for repentance is metanoia, which signifies a change of mind and direction. Another word which is also used is metamelomai, which signifies anxiety or sadness upon the consideration of sins done. True repentance involves a realization of sin on the ground that it is offensive to God; sorrow on account of the wrong done to God and man, and a hearty desire of submission to forsake everything repugnant to the Divine Will. Repentance is preceded by conviction, the chief difference between the two being that the latter is the work of the Holy Spirit, while the former is made by the human will to act in concert with the Spirit. The Roman Catholics hold that repentance imposes certain obligations, and burdens on those who sin, and these are known as PENITENCES [q.v.]. At the Reformation, however, repentance was defined as a "transformation of mind and affections," and declared to consist in faith in God and sorrow for sins. The Pietists laid a great stress on the necessity of repentance, and held that it necessitated a great spiritual struggle, which led to a controversy between them and the Lutherans. Others again hold that the essence of repentance consists in a change of mind and attitude towards

e turning toward Him, irrespective of amount of sorrow for sin consciously expressed. Appealing to Scripture, they urge it is called repentance (or change of mind) "toward God;" and that we are fully taught by Paul [2 Cor. vii. 9, 10] true godly sorrow worketh or produces repentance, being therefore a means to it, and effect. It is also urged that in the case of a young man who refused to go into the field, but "afterward repented and went," the efficacy of his repentance consisted not in amount of contrition he may have felt, but was only of value for the effect produced in the fact that he changed in his mind or will toward his father's command, and did what he had refused to do. It has been said further that the distinction so made is not a vain or meaningless one, since the commands "men everywhere to repent, because of the lack of a conscious sorrow they do not" is made by many an excuse for disobedience; whereas it is urged that God commands any man to do what his conscience does not tell him he might do, and the command were clearly interpreted and understood to mean the giving up or yielding of the will to God, which everywhere he might do, a great and real practical advance to many would be taken away. See that the evidences of true repentance may be sought and found in works "meet"

Reprobation.—The Greek word adokimasia, "disappointment," is translated "reprobation" Rom. i. 28; 2 Cor. xiii. 5, 6, 7; 2 Tim. ii. 16. It does not fall within our province to discuss the meaning of these passages, but the word in its technical ecclesiastical usage is used in the Reformation controversy as the antithesis to Election [q.v.]. It should, however, be observed that there is a large school of divines who do not consider that the Scriptural doctrine of reprobation involves the Calvinistic doctrine of election. Their contention is, that when the world lay in wickedness and condemnation came from God to call it to Himself for reconciliation, and that the Election was His choice of men who were to become members of the church for the purpose of carrying out the ministry of Reconciliation. St. Paul calls himself a "chosen vessel" with the object of bringing the Name of Christ to the Gentiles." Viewed, it will be seen, rests Reprobation on the Divine Will, but upon the persistence of wilful sinners. [ELECTION; PRE-REPROBATION.]

Repton.—A village in South Derbyshire long reckoned ecclesiastically as being the seat of the church of Christian Mercia. That kingdom, comprising the midlands of England, stretched from the Thames to the Mersey, and the first Bishop of Repton was consecrated in 656. In the outer walls of the crypt, beneath the chancel of the present, is a portion of the ancient church. That church was destroyed by the Danes in 874. Its successor was probably erected in the days of Edgar the Peaceful [958–975], and was dedicated to St. Wystan, a grandson of one of the Mercian kings. The present chancel is a portion of that church. The whole church has been to a great extent restored under the care of Mr. Blomfield, and is a very beautiful structure. It was hoped to restore the pre-Norman chancel in 1887.

Requiem.—A Mass for the dead performed in the Romish Church, so called from the first words of the introit, "Requiem æternam dona iis, Domine." Some musical compositions performed on occasions of mourning are also called Requiems.

Reredos [Fr. arrière dos].—The screen at the back of an altar. In cathedrals or other large churches a reredos was usually necessary to separate the sacristy from the apse or chapel behind it; in small churches, where there is no space behind the altar, a reredos is sometimes erected as an ornament, or the wall is painted or otherwise adorned instead. Beautiful examples of ancient reredoses are to be seen at Winchester, Durham, and St. Alban's, and several cathedrals have modern ones.

Reservation, MENTAL. [MENTAL RESERVATION.]

Reservation of Benefices.—In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Popes, in order to appoint favourites to benefices, made certain decrees which said that all livings which became vacant by death, if the last incumbent had died in Rome, should be reserved for the Pope. We read of Honorius IV. claiming the right to appoint when the living was vacant by resignation, and in course of time the practice was extended in all sorts of ways. It was put a stop to by the general rebellion in various countries against the despotic rule of the Bishop of Rome.

Reservation of the Sacrament.—The practice of reserving the consecrated elements of Holy Communion, which is the custom in the Church of Rome, was altogether abandoned by the Church of England at the Reformation. In the Roman Church the Host, after the conclusion of the Sacrament, is placed in a "tabernacle." In olden times this tabernacle was frequently in the shape of a tower, sometimes in that of a covered cup, sometimes (especially in France) in that of a dove. The aumbry, or cupboard, which is so frequently seen in old churches, was oftentimes the receptacle of the Reserved Host. Its presence was indicated by a light burning before it.

That reservation was practised in the early

Church is clear from the words of Justin Martyr. In a passage which is the very earliest mention of the Eucharist after Scripture, he says, "The deacons communicate each of those present, and carry away to the absent of the blest bread and wine." A passage in Tertullian would seem to imply that the faithful received the reserved Eucharist daily, and the early Fathers are full of proof that the Sacrament was "carried about" in the early Church. But probably the dangers of persecution, preventing the free meeting together, in great part accounts for this. And the practice led to such great abuses and superstitions that it was very early forbidden, except in special cases. One of these cases was reservation for the sick. As there was no office for private celebration in the Early Church, we conclude that reservation on their behalf was the ordinary rule, and those Canons which forbade reservation especially excepted the cases of the sick from such prohibition.

The conviction of the Church of the Reformation that abuses had come in by means of the practice of reservation beyond those which had caused the limitation in early times, led to the prohibition of the practice altogether, and a special service was placed in the Liturgy for the communion of the sick. The Twenty-eighth Article declares expressly that reservation is not according to Christ's ordinance. Of late years a movement has been made for reviving the practice of reservation, on the plea that in times of sickness the minister who has a large population will be unable to go through several communions in a day. But the movement has found no favour among the rulers of the Church, who apprehend, not without reason, that there is a desire to revive a practice which is of comparatively modern growth in the Church—namely, the exposure of the Sacrament in churches—for the purpose of sacramental adoration—a practice which is not to be separated in thought from the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation. In fear lest any countenance should be given to this doctrine, the Bishops, in 1885, after a careful discussion in Convocation, published a declaration that reservation of the Sacrament is contrary to the principles of the Church of England.

Residence.—Rules for the residence of ecclesiastics at their cures were laid down by several Councils in very early times, as abuses in the matter soon began to arise. Before the Reformation the evil of non-residence had greatly increased, partly in consequence of pluralities, and partly for less important reasons. It had again become a monstrous evil in the 18th century. Thus a return issued in 1737 gives 455 livings in Cheshire alone, where the incumbents were non-resident, 105 in Middlesex, etc. Since that time this evil has been remedied. The law concerning residence at the present day is that every clergyman must reside on his cure for at least nine months in every year, except when prevented by ill-health or other efficient cause, and that during his absence he must provide a curate to discharge his duties. Pluralities are forbidden, except under certain conditions; and a licensed pluralist is required to preach at least thirteen sermons every year at the benefice from which he is most absent, and to exercise hospitality there for two months yearly. There are still a few cases of clerics living who held benefices before the Act came into operation and who are thereby exempt, and thus the scandal remains of a few livings in which grown-up inhabitants have never once had an opportunity of seeing their rector.

Residentiary.—Those members of a cathedral body who are bound to reside in the vicinity of the cathedral, to conduct the services and to regulate ordinary affairs. Canons residentiary are attached to all cathedrals of the old foundation, and it was formerly required that they should all reside at the same time; but this caused much inconvenience, as many of them held other benefices, and regulations were made requiring certain conditions of residence, and specifying three months as the very least time in each year which a canon shall spend in residence.

Resignation.—The giving up a charge or preferment by a beneficed clergyman to the superior by whom it was originally presented to him. If the resignation is made in consequence of bodily or mental infirmity, the incumbent is entitled, under certain conditions, to a pension not exceeding one-third of the income of the benefice resigned. The resignation must be made in person, and without bargaining for preferment to some better appointment, though a difference is made when there is a question of exchange.

Resolutioners.—After the battle of Dunbar it was thought necessary to repeal certain Acts which had been passed at the beginning of the Commonwealth. The so-called Acts of Classes had declared that Royalists, or, to use the term employed in the Acts, Malignants, were incapable of holding any office in the State. In 1651, however, the "Resolutioners" wished to modify this decree, and brought a Bill before the Scotch Parliament which should allow any man to be a servant of the Crown unless he had been excommunicated by the Church. The leader of the party, who had great influence in England, and was in Cromwell's favour, was James Sharp, afterwards Bishop of St. Andrew's. The opposing party, headed by James Guthrie, were called Protesters. The struggle lasted till after the Restoration.

nds or Responses.—A name of the ancient Church for short verses of Scripture introduced into the middle of, or end of, the Lessons. The former "Short," and the latter the "Long." These are referred to in the rubrics concerning the Service of the Church, speaking of the reading of the Bible, "This godly and decent order of the Scriptures hath been altered, broken, and corrupted by planting in uncertain stories and with multitude of responds, verses," afterwards: "For this cause be cut off the responds, and invitatories, and such things which did break the continual course of the Scripture."

onse.—An answer made by the congregation to the prayers of the clergyman, according to the directions in the Prayer Book. Many of the Psalms are obviously intended to be sung or said alternately by the minister and people, and it was customary in the ancient Church that this form of worship was used. It has been banished from the liturgy of the Roman Church in great measure, as the prayers are said in Latin, and are unknown to most of the congregations. The custom of depending upon exhortations and prayers among Dissenters also has led to the use of responses. The Church of England maintains them for three reasons: [1] to show the unity of mind and will between the minister and people; [2] to heighten the devotion of the congregation; and [3] to arrest the attention of the people to the prayers of the whole congregation.

Responses are of four kinds: [1] "Amen" after each prayer; [2] the versicles; [3] repetitions, as in the Creed, Confession, etc., and [4] the "Gloria," after the rehearsal of each part of the service.

rationists.—A name given to a sect of the UNIVERSALISTS [q.v.]. They are separated from the original body in what was regarded as the original doctrine of Universalism—that there is a state of punishment for the wicked, but it is of limited duration, and that in the end they will be restored to happiness.

rection.—The historical fact of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ is the keystone of Christian teaching, the foundation of all Christian life. Upon it the whole fabric of Christian doctrine rests. "If Christ be not risen your faith is vain," wrote St. Paul to the Church at Corinth; and every Christian teacher and preacher in the same full and unqualified manner makes the truth of this fact the one upon which all he propounds must stand or fall. Not only does the whole of Christian doctrine depend upon it, but the entire question of miracles is bound up with it. Remove the Resurrection from the arch of miracle, and the other stones that form it fall away at once: but let this be clearly established, and it will bear the whole weight of the rest.

The first preachers of Christianity proclaimed clearly that Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified upon Calvary and died upon the Cross, came to life again in the tomb wherein He was laid, and appeared to His disciples at various times and in different places for the space of forty days, and then ascended out of their sight into heaven, since which He has never been seen by bodily eyes, except by St. Paul, when he was stricken down on the road to Damascus, and possibly afterwards.

The risen Jesus, according to the teaching of Christianity, was no spirit or ghost, but one who could be handled [Luke xxiv. 39], who had flesh and bones, who ate before His disciples; and yet whose body was no longer subject to those limitations of matter which govern the existence of earthly bodies, for it appeared and disappeared at a moment; it came into the midst of the disciples when they were sitting with closed doors, and finally it rose from the earth until a cloud received it out of the sight of the onlookers. It is manifest, then, that while the body of the risen Jesus was in a real sense identical with that which was crucified, since it bore the marks of the wounds inflicted upon it, and was recognisable to all who had previously known it, yet some great change had passed upon it, irreconcilable with all we at present know of the laws of matter. The fact of the Resurrection, however, rests upon human testimony of the strongest kind. Let us see what it is, and then state the objections made by those who are compelled to admit the testimony, but who try to explain it away.

All that we know of the Resurrection is told us in the writings of St. Paul and the Gospels of the New Testament. The existence of St. Paul, and the genuineness of his chief writings, is now universally admitted. He is as real a personage as Cicero, Julius Cæsar, or Thucydides. He was living at the time of the Resurrection as a member of the strictest sect of the Jews, and was a bitter and active opponent of those who believed in the claims of Jesus to be the Messiah. But, as he himself tells us, while on a journey to Damascus, he was struck to the ground, and then actually saw Jesus, heard Him speak and replied to Him, and ever after spent his life in proclaiming the doctrines he had bitterly opposed. Within a few years, twenty-eight at the most, he had written four letters known as the Epistle to the Romans, the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and the Epistle to the Galatians, in which he treats of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ as an admitted fact, upon which he founds a system of practical teaching affecting the whole lives of believers. Within seventy years of the Crucifixion—which it must be noticed was to the general public nothing more than the ignominious execution of a fraudulent political adventurer, a blasphemer against the God of His own race, and a traitor to the State (for it was the fact that He was supposed to be aiming at the throne of Judaea that made Him obnoxious to the Roman Government, and that He called Himself the Son of God that inspired the enmity of the Jews)—arose Churches of Christians all over the known world, whose members were prepared to die rather than deny the fact of the Resurrection. And from that day to this such Churches have continued to flourish and multiply.

Let it also be noted that one day of the week, the first, has from the very day on which our Lord rose from the grave been observed as the festival of the Resurrection, completely obliterating among Christians the observance of the seventh day of rest, the Sabbath of the Jews; and in addition to this weekly commemoration, there is the Great Feast of Easter, annually celebrated, the sole reason for which is the fact of the Resurrection of Jesus.

It being impossible, then, to deny that from the very day on which the Resurrection is said to have taken place there have been an ever-increasing number of people thoroughly believing in it as a fact, who have relied upon the word of those who were alive at the time, it becomes necessary to inquire into the nature of the objections urged against it. It has once been said that Jesus did not die, but merely fell into a deep swoon, from which He recovered; but this is never seriously advanced now, for it involves so many difficulties that the most inveterate adversaries of the Resurrection reject it with scorn. Others have declared that the disciples stole away the body of Jesus, and practised a fraud upon the world by saying that they had seen Him alive again. But, had such an imposition been attempted, is it likely that a few days afterwards its authors would have boldly proclaimed the Resurrection to a hostile crowd in the very city where the crucifixion took place, and where there would be hundreds of men eager to expose it? Would men and women have endured persecution, and even death, for the sake of a profitless fraud? Would there not have been some traitor in the camp, ready to sell his secret, as Judas was to betray Jesus? Such a theory, like the first, has been abandoned by every one, and there remains only one to be seriously examined, which is that commonly spoken of as the Theory of Visions. By those who hold it, it is asserted that the disciples, in their ardent affection and excited state of feeling, imagined that they had seen the Crucified One alive again amongst them on various occasions, and that He had said and done the things recorded of Him.

The strange power of imagination under certain conditions to give form and reality to mental impressions may be readily admitted, but we must note carefully what those conditions are. They are that what appears in vision must accord with previous desires of what should appear, with fixed ideas, and with an earnest expectancy of what shall occur. Were these the conditions under which the supposed visions appeared? Those who followed Jesus before His crucifixion were now a scattered, frightened few. Almost all who had once believed in Him had now forsaken Him. Two or three women and one or two men were all who remained faithful enough to care for His body, nor do we know of any who looked for a resurrection. Jesus had spoken to them of rising again, but, so far from their expecting such a thing, only one of His disciples, a woman, came to His grave on the morning of the third day, and that with no expectation of meeting Him alive but with the wish to render affectionate offices to His corpse. When at length she recognised Him she ran to tell others of the fact, but they were naturally incredulous. The same day towards evening Jesus appeared to two others on the road from Jerusalem to Emmaus, and so unprepared they for the resurrection of their Lord they failed to recognise Him, even when He talked to them. Upon their return to Jerusalem, they told what they had seen to eleven and those who were with them. They spoke Jesus appeared in the midst of them. To quiet their alarm, He had to assure them He was no ghost, but a body of flesh and bones. Eight days after that He appeared, the doors being shut, and He invited the unbelieving Thomas to put his finger into the print of the nails and his hand into the wound in His side. Once by the Sea of Galilee, at another time to five hundred, and last of all upon the Mount of Olives, He appeared to different groups of His disciples, and then, with the exception of His appearance to Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus, He ceased to appear to men, nor from that time onward did any one claim to have seen Jesus.

The objection has been made—What if these appearances were anything more than visions, that they were granted to disciples only, when surely His enemies might have been for ever silenced, crushed, and overthrown, if He had openly walked the streets of Jerusalem, or taught in the Temple? In such an objection the reply is obvious. In the time of Christ's contact with the world had gone by. It had deliberately rejected Him. It was and is no part of the mission of Jesus to force Himself upon the Jews, or upon any one. He always said that it was those who "were of the truth" who would hear His voice.

us has been ably pointed out by Wace, D.D. [The Gospel and its e objection springs from an en-ption of the object with which stories of the Resurrection are [it is not, and never was, the upon which the faith of the the life of the Church was was the existence of the Saviour d more than that, His actual ife-giving power, through His i gave the Church its founda-The disciples did not yield to the which mere visions would have proclaim simply our Lord's de-m the grave. proved that the Lord was with His Church, and this fact was to them the most certain of all realities. The Evangelists did not write, therefore, to prove the Resurrection. They wrote under the living conviction of the Resurrection being true; and they were only concerned to give such details of it as might suit their particular purpose." Thus, spite of the hostile attitude of the rulers and the op-position of the Sadducees, who denied both the resurrection and the existence of spirits, the preaching of the Apostles made its way amongst men, so that where, as at Corinth, there lived believers who regarded their own resurrection as a merely spiritual matter, they made no question of the actual bodily resur-rection of Jesus.

Again, not only was the reappearance of Jesus at variance with any ideas that could previously have been entertained by His disciples, but it was not confined to single individuals, and was given to many, amongst whom, in course of time, arose divisions and jealousies, which would, no doubt, have called forth denials or doubts of the resur-rection, could there have been any. Visions are transitory; the appearances of Jesus to the disciples were prolonged. During them He was able to enter into extended teaching as to the Kingdom of God, and the nature of the commission with which He entrusted them. Then, again, these ap-pearances came suddenly to an end with the Ascension of Jesus into heaven. Had they been merely the visions of excited and hys-terical subjects, would they not have con-tinued for an indefinite period? Is it not likely that men of ambitious or jealous tem-peraments would have claimed similar privi-leges to those which had been granted to the Apostles and others? But we do not hear of any others in the early Church who claimed to have seen the Lord, except St. Paul. Yet further, belief in Jesus as the Messiah died with His death upon the Cross. "We trusted," said the disappointed disciples on the road to Emmaus, "that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel." Affec-tion survived in the hearts of Mary and others, but faith was dead. With the Resurrection faith revived, and so much more powerful was it in its renewed life, that in a short time belief in the crucified but risen Jesus had made its way into the heart of Asia Minor, amongst the thriving Greek colonies on the shores of the Ægean, in the centres of com-merce and culture at Corinth and Athens, and in the imperial city of Rome.

One question may be asked of those who do not believe in the fact of the Resurrection, and yet cannot deny the existence of Jesus. If the story of the Resurrection be not true, what became of the body of Jesus? Two facts are now universally admitted by all serious critics: that on the first Easter morn-ing the grave of the Lord Jesus contained no having previously begun the language under Jakob Jehiel Loanz, the Emperor's Jewish physician. He then went to Stuttgart, and was resolved to devote himself to learning, but in 1501 was chosen judge of the Swabian League. In 1506 appeared his Rudiments of the Hebrew Language, which rendered possible the free study of the original Scripture. In 1509 a converted Jew, named Johann Pfefferkorn, of Cologne, advised Maximilian to burn all the books of the Rabbis, and the Emperor named a commission, of which Reuchlin was one, to consider the question. He accordingly wrote a document containing his opinion that the act would be very disastrous to Christian learning, and also shows that he had a decided inclination to religious toleration. This was shown to Pfefferkorn, who wrote a violent abuse of it in his Handspiegel, to which Reuchlin answered by Augenspiegel. The monks of Cologne were greatly incensed at this pamphlet, and declared that it contained forty-three Judaising propositions, and in 1513 selected Hoogstraten as accuser. Reuchlin was acquitted; but the Dominicans, not content, appealed to Pope Leo X., who appointed a commission to inquire into the matter, the majority of which were again on the side of Reuchlin, and the monks were forced to pay his expenses, and to make him compensation and apology. In 1519 Reuchlin went to Ingolstadt, where he received 200 gold crowns annually from the Duke William of Bavaria. He remained till the outbreak of plague there two years after, on which he returned to Stuttgart, and died there the same year [1522] of jaundice. Besides the Hebrew Grammar, Reuchlin wrote De Verbo, De Cabbala Placitis, a manual of law, etc.

Reunion.—It has become of late years a growing sorrow to many true and earnest Christians that the Church is divided into numberless sects which now exist; and the desire for unity among Christians has led to the formation of three societies within late years. These are: [1] the Association for the Unity of Christendom, the object of which is to unite the Church of England, and all Protestant bodies, the Romish and Greek Churches; [2] the Evangelical Alliance, to unite Protestants against the Church of Rome; and [3] the Reunion Society, whose object is to present the Church of England in a friendly attitude towards those who regard themselves as outside her pale, so as to lead to the corporate reunion of all Christians and the doctrines of the Ever-blessed Lord Jesus Christ." [UNITY.]

manners." And, therefore, Revelation is a subject which covers much ground. The works of nature are to the devout soul a revelation—"the heavens declare the glory of God." To deny this is really Atheism, for it denies that the world has an author. But the Christian believer declares that God has made Himself known, not only by the works of nature, but by special interventions since the heavens and earth were finished, and specially by the voice of Christ. He "hath in these last days spoken to us by His Son." Nature does not speak with such power as is needful to convince the world. And, therefore, we generally understand by Revelation a more distinct, a closer, more definite utterance. Such utterance involves a miraculous interposition, the direct action of a Divine Will, clearly to be distinguished from the realm of ordinary physical law.

We assume the existence of a personal God or Creator. We assume also that He speaks to the conscience and the heart. This may be denied to be a demonstrable truth, but there is, at least, nothing improbable in such an hypothesis. If it be credible on other grounds, there are no arguments which militate against it. The facts of nature are bewildering—the many races of men, their conflicts, their troubles and sorrows, the shortness of life, the curtain hanging over futurity, the constant defeat of good. No light comes from nature to explain all these things. But there is no antecedent improbability in the supposition that the Creator, who has yet left marks upon His works of a beneficent and loving purpose, may interfere in the anarchy, and defeat the suicidal passions of men, and bid them look to Him and be at peace. There is no improbability that He who was able to make the world should be able to influence His work. It is not improbable that an intercourse should take place between God and the soul. The real question at issue, and the only one, is, What is the evidence on which this intervention is believed? The doubt is not whether God can intervene, nor whether He is likely to have done so, but whether there is proof that He has intervened. This is a question which has already been considered under the head of MIRACLES.

Mr. John Stuart Mill, while confessing that there is no ground for denying the possibility of the Creator's interference, holds that the probability is against it, because "the whole of our observation of nature proves to us by incontrovertible evidence that the rule of His government is by means of second causes; that all facts, or, at least, all physical facts, follow uniformly on given physical conditions, and never occur but when the appropriate collocation of physical conditions is realised." But, on the other hand, it is strangely improbable, on the face of it, that God, having wrought His will in creation, having done so with minute and wondrous skill, should straightway cease to work at all. Creation involves duties. The parent having given birth to a child, does not leave it on a doorstep to take its chance of existence. We believe, then, that God, while always working, and sustaining His works, has at certain periods so exerted His will as to reveal the fact of His existence, and the purpose of His workings. He declared that He ruled the nations, that He hated iniquity, and loved righteousness, and in visible proof of this He interfered in the case of Israel and overthrew Pharaoh, in manifestation of His eternal and unchanging laws. He declared from the beginning that He is the Lord of Life, and would deliver His children from death. The miracles of Christ were one and all a revelation of this truth, and His resurrection is a witness sufficient for all ages that death is not the lord of man. The following passage from a valuable work entitled The Mystery of God, by T. Vincent Tymms, puts the case fairly—"Tonnyson sings: 'God fulfils Himself in many ways, lest one good custom should corrupt the world.' Is there not a profound suggestion here? If there be such a God, as we have reason to believe, one long custom might deceive the world into thinking there is no Worker at all! In spite of all the alleged miracles of Revelation, and the inexplicable events observed by science, men do infer the non-existence, or the non-activity, of God from that measure of uniformity they perceive. Would it not tend to cure this confusion of mind if God condescended to work a miracle of self-revelation? If continued life be the law for all human beings, would not a visible resurrection remove a false inference drawn from the general uniformity with which bodies remain in their graves? Would it not be corrective of some diametrically false calculations based on the supposition that death makes an end of all, and that there is no judgment to be looked for hereafter? If kindness be the law of God's treatment of men, would not a few visible examples of His mercy assuage a true faith in danger of being confounded by the prevalence of disease? If active sympathy with man be the real condition of God's mind, would not the revelation of such sympathy in a personal form be the dissipation of a false impression derived from the non-appearance of any superior Being to care for the inhabitants of a mechanical world? If, in spite of all human sin and misery and apparent failure, God is working out a plan which will bring in everlasting righteousness, would it not promote that result, and remove an intellectual confusion which is fitted to paralyse man's moral endeavours, if God were to grant a special disclosure of His purpose, and were to afford, by works no human might could perform, some illustration of His own power to upward, and thus, indirectly, also some assurance that the message was no cunningly devised fable, but a true word from Himself, and worthy of universal faith?"

Revenues of the Church.—In the days when persecution was rife, it may easily be imagined that the Church did not possess, and did not care to possess, lands or immovable property of any kind. The clergy were supported by voluntary offerings, made chiefly monthly, and distributed monthly, the funds being at the disposal of the bishop. In quieter times it became of frequent occurrence that lands and houses were assigned by will or otherwise to the augmentation of the revenues of the Church, for the relief of the poor, the maintenance of the fabric, and the support of the clergy, and the bishop was assisted by his economes, or steward, elected by the votes of the clergy. Besides such bequests, tithes and first-fruits came to be added on the Church, and some of the Emperors gave allowances of corn out of the public exchequer.

Reverend [abbreviated Rev.].—The title given to the clergy generally. Archbishops are called "most reverend;" bishops, "right reverend;" and deans, "very reverend." At the time of the Reformation the title was greatly objected to by some, on the ground that it may only be said of God, "Holy and reverend is His name." In the seventeenth century the general title for clergymen was "master." But it is now used by all, including most Dissenting ministers.

Revised Version.—The so-called "Authorized Version" of the Holy Scriptures was published in 1611, being itself a revision of numerous predecessors. Since that revision was made new MSS have been discovered, and carefully compared, with the result of showing many inaccuracies in the text from which the version of 1611 was made. Besides this, the sciences of geography, natural history, and of history have been formed and cultivated, and by their means light has been thrown on many parts of Scripture, and the names of several places, plants, animals, etc., in the version of 1611 have been discovered to be wrongly translated. Again, a number of words and phrases perfectly understood in the time of James I. have changed in meaning, and no longer express the ideas they once did. For such reasons as these, Biblical scholars have for a long period wished for a revision of the Bible, and several of them made advances in the way of partial translations from time to time. In the early part of 1870, the Convocation of Canterbury formed a committee for the purpose of preparing a scheme for the revision of the Authorized Version. As the result, two companies of revisers were chosen from the most eminent scholars in England—twenty-four for the revision of the Old Testament and twenty-four for the revision of the New Testament, who were to take counsel with two companies of American scholars. The Bishop of Gloucester ristol (Dr. Ellicott) was chairman of the Testament company; Bishop Thirlwall (avid's), and afterwards Bishop Harold (Winchester), of the Old Testament ny.

labours of the New Testament revisers led over a period of ten years and five s, and were brought to a close on November, 1880, whilst the revision of the Old Testament was not completed until July 10th,

The leading rule for both companies to introduce as few alterations as possible to the text of the Authorised Version tently with faithfulness."

Revised Version of the New Testament.—By systematic comparison of MSS., the New Testament company formed a revised text of the Greek Testament (afterwards published in the Revisers' Text of the Greek Testament), which was the basis of their revision.

specimens of the various kinds of changes made may be given. The well-known text of the three heavenly witnesses [in v. 7] disappears, because it is found in one or two Greek MSS., and those of the slightest authority. This was a necessary correction of the text. Amongst words and phrases which have altered in meaning to be mentioned, "by and by" [Matt. 11], which formerly meant "straightaway," as it now appears in the Revised New Testament. In the same verse, the word "is led" has given place to "stumbleth," the meaning is, not that the man is irritated and angry at persecution, but that it

him stumble in his religious walk or and so become unfruitful. To "precede" the place of "prevent" in 1 Thess. 5; and "judgment," of "damnation" in v. 29 and 1 Cor. xi. 29. These various alterations are very numerous, and especially in the epistles, the meaning of which in many difficult places has been rendered clear: thus, "I know nothing by myself" [1 Cor. iv. 4]; and Philipp. ii. 6, "who, being in the form of God, thought it robbery to be equal with God," is now made by being rendered ". . . counted it not to be on an equality with God."

Revised Version of the Old Testament.—At the oldest MSS. of the New Testament from the fourth and fifth centuries, the Hebrew MSS. of the Old Testament date from the tenth and eleventh centuries, and these, unlike the MSS. of the New Testament, belong to one family—i.e. have from one source—and do not differ in essentials from the Masoretic, or traditional Hebrew text, printed in ordinary Hebrew; hence the Old Testament revisers had the materials for forming a new text. As this, the ancient versions of the Hebrew Bible, of which the Septuagint is the oldest and most important, yield a text which, in the opinion of scholars, is inferior to the ordinary Hebrew one, so that although very valuable emendations have been made by the help of these various materials, the number of them is much less than in the New Testament. A few specimens of the changes in the revised Old Testament may be given. Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 18, etc.: "the plain of Moreh," "the plain of Mamre," become "the oak of Moreh," "the oaks of Mamre." In Exod. xxxiv. 13, "cut down their groves," is rendered "cut down their asherim," since ashérah is not a grove, but the wooden symbol of a goddess, of which the plural is asherim. This change has been made in several places. Generally speaking, the translation of the Psalms in the Authorised Version is a good one. There are, however, some valuable changes in the revision; thus the meaning of Ps. xvi. 2, 3 is now made plain. Authorised Version: "O my soul, thou hast said unto the LORD, Thou art my Lord: my goodness extendeth not to thee; But to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight," reads in the Revised Version, "I have said unto the LORD, Thou art my Lord: I have no good beyond thee. As for the saints that are in the earth, They are the excellent in whom is all my delight."

It is a great gain to the unlearned reader that he should have before him in the Revised Version of the New Testament an exact translation of what is, in the judgment of competent scholars, a close approximation to the actual text of the original Greek, instead of one made from a text confessedly imperfect; and in the Revised Version of the Old Testament a translation of the Hebrew, much more accurate than that of the Authorised Version. The gain is so great that it is to be regretted that anything should have hindered the popularity of the revised Bible; but in the New Testament (not in the Old) there are a considerable number of small verbal alterations, which, without conveying to the ordinary reader any point in the original Greek, mar the rhythm of well-known passages; the repetition of "and" in Matt. xiii. 37-39 is one instance in point.

To many it will be a consoling thought to remember that in the Revised Bible no Scripture doctrine, no Scripture precept has been changed; and that whatever can be proved from the old version can be proved from the new. The great truths of religion remain firm; indeed, the accuracy of the translation renders them far less exposed to challenge than they were before.

The interesting preface—"The Translators to the Reader"—of the revisers of 1611, and the prefaces of the Old and New Testament companies of the present time, are well worth careful perusal.

Revision of the Prayer-Book.—In the article on COMMON PRAYER we have told how the attempted revision of 1689 came nation of a sect. This is all that I demand of us. Only let us alter the language formularies of baptism, absolution, and communion, and we shall remove occasions of offence; only let us make, that is, the new document sufficiently one-sided to announce but our own views."

revivals of Religion.—The word "revival" in a religious sense is used to signify a re-awakening in the Church which results in the strengthening of religious feeling. Such events undoubtedly occurred both in ancient and modern times. Thus Elijah, when "he built the altar of the Lord, which was fallen down," symbolised thereby that he was the great reviver of religion when men were ready to die. The work of the Prophets is of a like character. St. Peter in his first sermon on the day of Pentecost addressed the people in a language that implied that Christ had come to revive in their hearts the religion of their fathers, to complete it, and to destroy it. The history of Christianity has furnished marked epochs of a re-awakening of religious life. Such, in spite of all errors and abuses, were the Benedictine and Cistercian movements, and the Crusades; the zeal of the Mendicant Friars and the Reformation. The Methodist movement of the last century, known by the name of "Great Awakening," influenced the whole of England, Scotland, Ireland, and America. The Evangelical zeal of the last century, and of the Tract writers in the nineteenth century, must be recognised as religious revivals.

Mistakes are made, and much is said of which religious men on this side and that disapprove, but where there is a real zeal for the souls of men and their salvation, it is always seen, when the din of controversy has died away, that good has been done and the kingdom of the Redeemer extended. The most prominent of more recent revival movements has been that promoted on several successive occasions by the labours of Mr. Daniel Moody and Mr. Ira D. Baker, two American evangelists, in which distinct aid was given by the latter of hymns setting simple truths of the Gospel—or they considered to be such—formed a part as prominent as the homely addresses of Mr. Moody. The testimony adduced on the subject to the great practical results of these revivals must be to any but prejudiced minds a proof of the real use and occasional need of such so-called revivals. Many doubtless have been converted; but many more do not, and have been brought by the consistent conduct of years to the same state as they had gained. It has, however, been felt and expressed by many of late years is a danger in the so-called "un-national" character of such services as are now referred to, though there may have been reasons for it in the neglect of evangelistic effort by the various organised

Churches. In some cases it has led to a development of Plymouth Brethrenism; but, apart from this, it has been felt that such movements often fail to provide subsequent responsible oversight and care for the new converts, and that it is better every way for the Churches themselves to undertake revival, or, strictly, evangelistic work. The Church of England has felt this very strongly, and has latterly introduced what are called "mission" services, with special preachers, often called "missioners," who make periodical visitations to parishes, by arrangement, with a view to stirring up religious life among the inhabitants. These are in reality revival movements and services under another name. Other denominations have, to a smaller extent, done the same thing, and this awakening of the Churches to their own duty seems gathering in force.

Reynolds, Edward, Bishop of Norwich, was born at Southampton in 1599, and educated at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became a Probation Fellow in 1620. On his ordination he became Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and Rector of Braynton in Northamptonshire. He was a prominent member of the Presbyterian party, and one of the Westminster Assembly. On the ejection of Dr. Fell from Oxford in 1646, Dr. Reynolds became Vice-Chancellor of the University, and afterwards Dean of Christ Church. However, he offended the royalists, and was ejected from the deanery by the Independents. He then became Vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry. At the Restoration he was appointed chaplain to King Charles, and Warden of Merton College. When the Bishopric of Norwich was offered him, it was much doubted whether he would take it; but he at last consented, and was consecrated, Jan. 6th, 1661. He ruled the diocese for sixteen years, working hard to improve the condition of the poorer clergy. He was present at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and composed the "General Thanksgiving," which was then inserted. He died in 1676.

Reynolds, John, D.D. (sometimes written Rainolds) [b. at Pinbo, Devonshire, 1549; d. at Oxford, 1617], a Puritan divine. For a short time he was Dean of Lincoln, and then was chosen President of Corpus Christi, Oxford. He was one of the four Puritans who represented their party at the Hampton Court Conference [q.v.], and is said to have been the first to propose the present Authorised Version of the Bible, to which he contributed the greater part of the Prophets.

Richard of St. Victor was born in Scotland in the twelfth century, and became prior of the Augustine abbey of St. Victor, in Paris, in 1162. He wrote several moral, theological, and mystical works, as De Statu Interioris Hominis, De Eruditione Interioris sioners for examination on the last September and again on October 1st. standing all the persuasions and of their enemies, they continued steady profession of that faith which they received as the faith of Christ; they accordingly judged to be obstinate, sentenced to be degraded from all in the Church, and delivered over to magistrates to be punished. On October 10th, Dr. Brooke, Bishop of Gloucester, with the Chancellor of Oxford, and many heads of the university, came to the house of Mr. Irish, then Mayor of Oxford, where Ridley was confined, for the purpose of depriving him from the dignity of priest. He was again exhorted to return to the communion of the Roman Church and submit to the authority of the Pope; but, on his refusal, they began the ceremony of taking away his surplice and putting a surplice upon him. When brought the chalice and the host, he refused to hold them in his hands; and said, "They shall not come into my hands if they do, they shall fall to the ground for all me." Upon this, some one was ordered to hold them in his hand, and Dr. Brooke said in Latin, "We do take from thee the power of preaching the Gospel." At these words Ridley sighed deeply, looked up to heaven, and said, "O Lord God, forgive them this their wickedness." This prayer being ended, Ridley said, "If you will, give me leave to talk with you a little concerning these matters." Brooke said, "We may not talk with you, you are a prisoner of the Church." Then Ridley said, "You will not talk with me, nor will you be so kind to hear me, what remedy but I refer my cause to my heavenly Father, who will reform things that be amiss, and shall please Him." As they were thus talking, Ridley said, "My lord, I wish that your friendship would vouchsafe to read over a book of Bertram's concerning the Sacrament; you will find therein much good learning; you will read it with an indifferent heart." To this Brooke made no answer, and was going away, when Ridley said, "As it is to no purpose, I will say no more; I will talk of worldly affairs." He then treated Dr. Brooke to interest himself in the Queen on behalf of a great many men to whom he had granted leases of land; he was Bishop of London, which had been taken away from them by Bonner, who succeeded him in the bishopric. On behalf of Ridley he wrote a supplication to the Queen wherein he prayed her Majesty that he might be restored to their possessions, but his request could not be granted, that might be made up by the sale of his plate and other effects which he had in his house at the time of his imprisonment. He also further besought the Queen to keep him under her protection his sister and her husband, who, with three children, had been dependent upon him. For their support he had made a small provision, which Bonner had deprived them of, notwithstanding the great kindness which Ridley had shown to Bonner's mother and sister. This supplication Ridley delivered to his brother-in-law to present to the Queen, requesting Dr. Brooke to second it with his support, which he promised to do, and then formally delivered Ridley to the bailiffs, charging them to bring him to the place of execution when they were commanded. The same evening, being the night before he suffered, as he sat at supper, he bade his hostess and the rest at board to his "marriage," as he termed his death, which he believed would admit him to the marriage supper of the Lamb. At this conversation Mrs. Irish wept; but Ridley comforted her, and said, "Oh, Mrs. Irish, quiet yourself; though my breakfast be somewhat sharp and painful, yet am I sure my supper shall be more pleasant and sweet." When they arose from table, his brother offered to watch all night with him; but he said, "No, that you shall not, for I intend (God willing) to go to bed and to sleep as quietly to-night as ever I did in my life." His brother then departed, exhorting him to be of good cheer and to take his cross quietly, for the reward was great.

The place appointed for the burning of Ridley and Latimer was on the north side of Oxford, close to Balliol College. Hither, on Oct. 16th, 1555, the prisoners were brought by the Mayor and bailiffs. Ridley was dressed in a black gown, furred and faced with ermine, such as he used to wear when he was a bishop. He also had a tippet furred about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, with a corner cap upon the same. He walked to the stake in slippers between the Mayor and Aldermen. The aged Latimer followed. When they were come to the stake, Ridley, earnestly holding up both his hands, looked towards heaven. Then seeing Latimer, with a cheerful look he ran to him, embraced and kissed him, saying, "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame or else strengthen us to abide it." He then went to the stake, kissed it, kneeled down by it and earnestly prayed; beside him kneeled Latimer, likewise earnestly calling upon God. Ridley took his gown and tippet, and gave them to his brother-in-law, who had affectionately remained at Oxford the whole time of his imprisonment, to provide him necessaries; some other of his apparel he also gave away, the rest the bailiffs took. He made presents also of some other small things to gentlemen who were standing by weeping. Then, being in his shirt, he stood upon the stone by the stake, and held up his hands and said, "O heavenly Father, I give unto Thee most hearty thanks, for that Thou hast called me to be a professor of Thee even unto Rite.—The name given to the book s the liturgy of the Roman Church, mainly for the use of the priests. It the services for baptism, penance, , etc. It was drawn up during the h century, to prevent any change or n in the ritual of the services.

Ritualism.—Strictly speaking, a Ritual- ist is one who studies the history and char- acter of the ancient rites of the Church, like Bingham, the author of the Ecclesiastical Antiquities. But the name of Ritualism is now given to the practical developments of the High Church views promulgated in the Tracts for the Times [TRACTARIANISM], and in other writings of Pusey and Keble. Those views taught that the Sacraments were actual means of conveying grace, that Baptism conveys Regeneration, and that in the Eucharist Christ is verily and in- deed present, though in a spiritual manner. The use of new ritual in the Church of England, which sprang up almost suddenly about the year 1859, was the assertion of these views by visible symbolism. No new doc- trine was advanced, but the doctrines which had hitherto been taught to the ear were now sought to be inculcated through the eye.

There are, however, two distinct elements to be traced in the Ritualistic movement. The one is the æsthetic. A great wave of antiquarian, artistic, architectural feeling has passed over Europe. Partly this was a reaction against the French Revolution; in our own country it was against the Whiggism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The revival of Gothic architecture, strange to say, was largely owing to a Quaker, Rickman, but it has been strong and continuous. Thousands of new churches have arisen beautiful of form, and in which music has been cultivated to a degree which would have struck our forefathers, with their trombones and Tate and Brady Psalms, with astonishment. In Presbyterian Scotland the change has been no less wonder- ful. Glasgow Cathedral is filled with stained glass, and many churches have organs, which once were considered the special mark of the Beast. The other element is the sacerdotal doctrine. The adoption of special vest- ments marks a conviction on the part of the adopters that the doctrine of the Sacraments is at one with that of the Church of Rome, so far as regards real efficacy in them, and a special presence of Christ. It is said by its advo- cates, "There is no evil in approximating to Rome or to any other Christian body; what- ever promotes Unity is good and not bad. It is true that there have been those who held the Pope to be Antichrist, but this is not the doctrine of the Church of England or of educated men. We will, so far as we can, assert our points of union. There is in every religious ceremonial a dramatic element—the breaking of the bread and the pouring out of the wine is such; therefore we do right to attach importance to the teaching of the eye."

Thus it is matter of fact that our genera- tion has seen the introduction into public worship of practices, some of which have not been in use since the days of Elizabeth, the alleged ground for the renewal being that the Church has suffered and lost ground through their disuse. These practices, known as the "Six Points," are:—[1] the use of Coloured [or White] Vestments; [2] Lights on the Lord's Table; [3] the Mixed Chalice; [4] Unleavened Bread; [5] the Eastward Position; [6] Incense. [Each is considered in its place.] In 1867 Dean Stanley wrote an article in the Edinburgh Review advocating the toleration of the Ritualists. "Alien," he wrote, "as many of their tenets are to the general spirit of their Church and nation, they have enough in common with the composite aspect of the formularies of the Church, and the double-sided character of the nation, to give them a standing-place in the eye at once of law and of charity. It must also be added that they have virtues of their own which supply a useful counterpoise to the narrowness or perverseness of other elements in the ecclesiastical world. In the earlier days of the movement they counted amongst their ranks lofty characters and noble deeds and persuasive words, which the English Church will not willingly let die. Amongst them are still to be found some endowed with ardent, self-denying activity; some gifted with a refined or fiery eloquence, which redeem much that we condemn in their theory and their position, and which place them thus far on a level with the equally ardent and more successful leaders of the Wesleyan movement in former times, and with those numerous clergy in our own time who need no stimulant from party-spirit, or from sectarian zeal, to devote themselves to the unobtrusive performance of their Master's work. And we must remember that these High Church Dissenters are more amenable to the control of English law, to the softening effects of social and Christian intercourse, inside the National Church, than if they were cast out from it. By expelling them from it we should not divest ourselves of our responsibility in regard to them. We cannot burn them, as in the days of Mary; we cannot hang them, as in the days of Elizabeth; we cannot banish them, as in the days of Charles I. or Cromwell. By driving them to extremities we might perpetuate the evil for generations. If they became a separate sect, they would remain like other Nonconformists, with the additional extravagance which every isolated and exasperated sect is sure to take to itself. If they became Roman Catholics, they and those who are guided by them would be parted from the national interests and national sympathies by a gulf which it might take centuries to close. On the other hand, if they were allowed to retain their position within the Church, the fashion would probably pass away with the present generation, and their children and grandchildren would be the staunch Puritans or Liberals of the coming age; and even they themselves, judging by the changes which come over individuals and parties, would imperceptibly melt away into the adjacent shades of opinion, by which they are attached to the diverse, but still by the body of the Established Clergy."

The counsel thus given was not followed. Before it was given, attempts had been made to put down Ritualism. An attack on some coloured altar-cloths at the Knightsbridge, and the judgment in favour of the Knightsbridge, incidentally laid much stress on the Rubric [q.v.], and, in connection with this rubric the controversy was revived. The resumption of the vestments was based upon the ground that they were certainly in use "in the second year of Edward VI.," and that the Rubric sanctions them. In fact the Rubric affirmed that they were only to be used if the Rubric sanctioned. Unhappy controversies which arose were characterized by extreme bitterness and even by violence of language; and when, in place of the unity of opinion for which Stanley pleaded, prosecutions were set on foot, the judgments were fierce in their animosities. The judgments that were given were not in favour of the Rubric. They were the Knightsbridge, in 1868; and the Purbeck, in 1868; and the Purbeck. The Ritualists, acquiring boldness from the conflicting views which had been put down, and also from the success which they claimed to have had in drawing people to the churches and in influencing large numbers of the population for good, refused to be deterred by the judgments. Their opponents pointed out that the older fathers of the Church had never adopted these practices. Dr. Pusey immediately came to the aid of the Rubric and declared that he and his friends had always understood the Ornament and Rubric as the Rubricists did the Ritualists, and were conscious of themselves disobeying it, but that they had to teach the faith to a new generation, and therefore they left it to their successors to revive. Two societies were formed up: the English Church Union, to protect the Rubric as the Rubricists did it; and the Church Association, to do what their opponents understood as a protestantism of the Church of England. In the anxiety to bring about a uniformity of practice, Archbishop Tait brought in the Worship Regulation Act in 1874. The FOLKESTONE JUDGMENT [q.v.], in 1874, was almost entirely against Ritualism. The revocation of this decision by the whole body of the High Church party led to the endeavour of the Archbishop to bring the Ecclesiastical Courts [q.v.] into line. A compromise has been made, but has never been accepted by Parliament. Meanwhile peace and order to a great extent returned. Archbishop Tait himself, in at least a dozen cases, prevented prosecutions by the exercise of the power given by the Act, and his example was almost universally followed by the other bishops. It is felt on all sides that the extreme the relief of misery, are of moment than "questions and candlesticks," to use the phrase, and that any systems these works must possess. Mutual forbearance has, and will do more.

skeletons, which were largely amplified in actual delivery. These ran through many editions, and were followed by others, including Notes on Genesis and on The First Epistle to the Corinthians, the last being The Human Race, and other Sermons, published in 1881. His Life and Letters have also been published, written and edited by the Rev. Stopford Brooke.

Robertson, JAMES CRAIGIE [b. 1813, d. 1882], Canon of Canterbury, and Professor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London, wrote several works on that subject, as How shall we Conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England? [1843], History of the Christian Church to the Reformation [1853-73], Sketches of Church History [1855-78], Biography of Thomas Becket [1859], and Plain Lectures on the Growth of the Papal Power [1876]. His Church History is now regarded as the standard work on the subject.

Robertson, WILLIAM.—An eminent Scottish historian and controversialist [b. 1721, d. 1793]. Little is known of his early life, but he was a volunteer in the '45; four years after, he received his licence to preach, and became minister of the Old Greyfriars in Edinburgh in 1758. Next year he published his history of Scotland, in 1769 that of Charles V., and in 1777, of America. He was made one of the King's Chaplains in 1761, and Principal of the University in 1762. In 1751 he appeared on the General Assembly, and was soon recognised as the leader of the "Moderates" in the great Patronage Controversy which was then going on [SECESSIONISTS], a position which he held for many years. He retired into private life in 1780, living in a country house thenceforward till his death. He proved how faithful he remained to his moderate principles, by pleading in the year of his retirement for relaxation of the penal statutes against the Roman Catholics. For this he incurred great odium, and his house was attacked by the mob.

Another curious controversy in which he was engaged arose out of Home's once famous tragedy of Douglas. Home was a minister, and a great outcry was made both against him and against some of the ministers who went to see the play performed in Edinburgh. So fierce was the storm that Home resigned his pastoral charge. Carlyle, one of the Edinburgh ministers, was suspended by his Presbytery, and appealed to the Synod, which reversed the suspension; but by a majority of three carried a sentence of "admonition." From the Synod the case was carried to the Assembly, when Robertson stood forth as Carlyle's defender and the advocate of liberty, and the judgment of the Synod was confirmed by 117 to 39. During the sitting of the General Assembly, Mrs. Siddons was acting in Edinburgh, and the business had to be arranged so that unimportant management of it to an uncle, and as a pilgrim, begging his way to Passing through the town of Aquila, in Tuscany, he found that the pest was raging fiercely, and immediately his services to the Governor of the town.

When the town was free of the pest he moved to another town which was stricken in the same manner, and devoted himself to nursing and caring for the victims, his appearance almost miraculously free from risk of infection. He spent some years at Rome, and then journeyed to Lombardy. At Piacenza he was himself stricken with the plague, and in all his self-denying care of others, he was entirely alone, and even told with earnestness that he must leave the town, almost unable to move. He got as far as a hut in a neighbouring wood, and took shelter. Here he was found by a nobleman named Gothard, who, in the deadly and infectious disease from which he was suffering, nursed him most carefully.

When Roch got well he persuaded him to give up the world and devote himself to the religious life. He then returned to his native town, and died there Aug. 17th, 1327. He was buried in his native town; but in 1327 his body was removed to Venice, where, in consequence of the great veneration in which his name was held, a large church was built for the reception of his relics.

ROCHESTER, BISHOPRIC OF.—This See was founded by King Ethelbert and St. Augustine, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 604, at the same time with the foundation of that of London. The Bishopric of Rochester seems originally to have occupied a position somewhat similar to that of the Archbishops of Canterbury, who had a small fixed diocese also assigned to them, somewhat irregularly distributed in the south of Kent. In 1840 a great change took place in consequence of the vast increase of the metropolis, and the counties of Hertfordshire, Essex, with some small exceptions, were formed into a new Bishopric of Rochester, only the district around the cathedral city being retained for it in the County of Kent. By still more recent legislation, the two counties north of the Thames were added into the Diocese of St. Albans, and the Diocese of Rochester was again extended, which embraced the district around the cathedral city, together with the Metropolitan portion of the county of Kent, which was taken from the Diocese of London. It has thus become a populous and fertile diocese, extending along the coast from Woolwich to Kingston, and southward to the border of Sussex, and including also detached portions at the mouth of the Thames and the Medway from Rochester to Gravesend.

The endowment of the See of Rochester amounts to £3,000 a-year.

Bede says that a cathedral was built by King Ethelbert at the foundation of the bishopric in A.D. 604, and dedicated in the name of St. Andrew. Of this cathedral there is no further notice until the Conquest, when it is stated to have been in ruins. It was rebuilt by Bishops Gundulf, Ernulf, and John of Canterbury, between 1077 and 1130 (when it became the church of a Benedictine monastery), and was consecrated four days after the consecration of Canterbury Cathedral on Ascension Day, May 11th, 1130, in the presence of Henry I. and most of the Bishops of England.

In 1137 and 1139 great fires occurred in the cathedral, which necessitated a partial ification. He also wrote commentaries Epistle to the Romans, on select Daniel, St. John's Gospel, Ephesians, Colossians, Thessalonians, and of London, was one day passing by the church, and hearing the cause of such a scene in the streets, he ordered that Romaine should be allowed by the Rector to preach at the ordinary hour, and that the doors of the church should be opened also earlier, so as to avoid the crushing and crowding. This interference of the Bishop on his behalf put an end to the system of opposition which he had so meekly and patiently endured so long. His style in preaching was simple, plain, eloquent, and marked by a touching earnestness. In 1757 he obtained a preacher-ship at St. Bartholomew the Great, Smith- field, and in 1776 was chosen by the parishioners Rector of St. Andrew Wardrobe and St. Anne, Blackfriars—an office he held till his death. His habit of living was simple and regular in the extreme, which tended to give him such a long and healthy life. He died at the age of eighty-one, on July 26th, 1795.

Rome, CHURCH OF.—The very extent and influence of this vast Church, and the fact that it is the historical parent of all Western communions—as much so of those who most dissent from it as of the others—have made it necessary to treat various branches of the subject so extensively else- where under various headings, that less is needed in this place than has been devoted to other denominations of far less importance. The foundation of this Church is uncertain, but we know that when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans he had not yet visited Rome, though he did so afterwards. St. Peter is said to have been the first Bishop, and tradition says that he was martyred there. The mighty importance of the City of Rome naturally gave its bishop a great position, but the fact that it became for a while the arbiter and ruler of all Christendom is the most remarkable fact in the history of Christianity. The causes of the great silent change will be found under the heading PAPAL POWER, GROWTH OF; and the list of Bishops, under POPES; and the emancipation of a large part of Christendom, under REFORMATION. The controversy between Rome and Protestantism involves two main questions. In the first place, Protestants deny the authority of the Pope over them at all; and secondly, a large portion of the doctrine of the Roman Church is rejected as being a corruption of Apostolic Christianity. The Roman Church recognises seven Sacraments, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Holy Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unc- tion, Holy Orders, Matrimony. One of the chief characteristics of this religion is that of invoking help of the Virgin and the Saints. In defence, Roman Catholics say that they do no more than ask the prayers of those who, from their perfected state, must be more worthy to offer them than they; but in most books of devotion the prayers addressed to the Blessed Virgin and the Saints are such as ging the authenticity of the tale which shop had caused to be published concerning the relic. The article was responded in all quarters with tokens of sympathy, great stir was made among all religious nations in Germany. Ronge was excommunicated by the Chapter of Breslau in 1844, and in January, 1845, the German Catholic Church was founded, with Ronge at its pastor. Another congregation, which was formed at Schneidemühl, in Posen, some time before, headed by Cieski, and itself the Christian Apostolic Catholic, became united to the German Catholics, two met at Easter, 1845, to agree upon and arrange the new organisation. Some Creed was retained, Scripture alone to be the standard of faith, and the clergy, the doctrine of Purgatory, transubstantiation, and the Seven Sacraments of the Roman Church were rejected. Their strong hopes entertained that a German National Church would be reached holding the faith of the Creeds, rejecting Papal domination. But this vanished when it was seen that the body of the Lord Jesus Christ was treated as a doubtful question, though Cieski strove to preserve this cardinal doctrine of Christianity.

The number of congregations increased rapidly, but they were opposed by native Protestants, who dreaded more than Papal domination, and by those of the State, who feared that an attempt was being made to undermine existing institutions, and especially all religion. They were expelled from Baden as dangerous to public welfare; and internal discords arose, through which the cause gradually declined. By 1858 the number of congregations had diminished by one-half, and in 1860 he himself took refuge in England, occupied himself with preaching to Germans in London. The greater part of his writings have been suppressed, and the movement has become absorbed among the various religious sects.

Rood [Saxon, rood, "a cross"].—This name is sometimes applied to the cross on which Christ died, although when used to signify the true cross the prefix "holy" is usually added, as Holyrood in Edinburgh. It is more commonly applied to the cross which was formerly erected at the entrance of a church or in a gallery called the Roodloft, on which was erected a large crucifix or cross, sometimes with figures also of the Virgin and St. John. In England after the Reformation the rood was, as a rule, removed; but there are some still remaining, and where they have been removed many churches have no galleries remaining.

Rosa, Sr., was born at Lima, in the Province of Peru, in 1606. Her parents were of good family, and rich, until Rosa was about fifteen, when they fell into most distressing poverty. Their daughter devoted herself to them, but they were continually urging her to accept one of her many suitors. She, however, had determined to remain single, and as a sure safeguard against being shaken in her resolution, she took the habit of the Third Order of St. Dominick in 1606. She spent a life of severe fasting, and in remembrance of our Saviour's Passion wore round her head a circlet of silver studded inside with sharp pins. She was possessed of a very vivid and excitable imagination, and was haunted for years by most horrible phantasms and apparitions, all of which she regarded as assaults of the Evil One, but which were no doubt owing to want of due nourishment. After years of suffering from a complication of diseases, she died Aug. 24th, 1617, and was buried in the Dominican convent of Lima. She was canonised by Clement X., who ordered her festival to be kept on Aug. 30th.

Rosary [Lat. rosarium, "a chaplet of roses"].—A form of prayer recited on beads by the Roman Catholics. It consists of fifteen decades of Ave Marias, each preceded by a Paternoster and followed by a Gloria. The rosary is divided into three parts, each of which is called a chaplet or corona. It was instituted to commemorate the fifteen mysteries—five joyful, five sorrowful, and five glorious—of the Virgin Mary. The practice of using beads, etc., is very ancient, having been in use as early as the fifth century; but the rosary was introduced much later. Some say it was instituted by St. Dominic, who learned its use from the Virgin in a vision in 1268.

Roscellin or Roscelin, was born in the diocese of Soissons in the eleventh century, and educated at Rheims. About 1089 he became Canon of Compiègne, and put forth heretical views of the doctrine of the Trinity—namely, that the three names of the Trinity are the names of three individual substances, as distinct as three angels, and that the unity of the Trinity is a mere verbal expression, implying a unity in power, as there may be among the angels. In 1092 a Council was called at Soissons, at which Roscellin was condemned, and obliged to recant. He fled to England, where he retracted his recantation, and wrote against his principal antagonist, Anselm (who had written De Fide Trinitatis against him), accusing him of holding heretical views on the Incarnation. Anselm had lately become Archbishop of Canterbury, and this caused a quarrel between him and the King, but they were reconciled, and Roscellin was forced to return to France. He became Canon of Tours, and shortly after began a controversy with his former disciple, Abelard. The latter had in his early years been a strong partisan of Roscellin, but his views took a more modified form, and greatly resembled on the Continent, some prominent men—as Robert Fludd and Jacob Behmen—defending it boldly, others declaring that it had some hidden purpose in view against Lutheranism, and that this talk about science, etc., was simply to put people off their guard. Gradually the name “Rosicrucian” became a generic term for every species of occult pretension; in general usage the term is specially associated with that branch of the secret art which has to do with the creatures of the elements. [THEOSOPHY.]

Rosminians or Fathers of the Institute of Charity.—A congregation founded in 1828 by Antonio Rosmini, an Italian philosopher. Their chief aim was to be the practice of the virtue of charity, and their work was to consist in preaching, visiting the sick and prisoners, relieving the poor, missionary-work and education, and praying for the dead. Their first house was at Monte Calvario, near Domo d'Ossola, and within a few years they established branch institutions at Trent, Verona, and Bath. The congregation was approved by Pope Gregory XVI. in 1838, and in the following year its members took the vows required by the rule, and Rosmini was made Superior-General of the Institute for life. Some of his philosophical works were condemned in 1860 by the Congregation of the Index, but the whole collection was subsequently examined, and pronounced undeserving of censure from a theological point of view. Some years after Rosmini's death, a house at Stresa belonging to the Order, and occupied by the founder during the later years of his life, was confiscated by the Piedmontese Government. Nine houses belonging to the Institute are in existence in England and Wales.

Rothe, RICHARD (b. at Posen, 1799; d. at Heidelberg, 1867), German theologian, was educated at Breslau, and studied theology at Heidelberg, Berlin, and Wittenberg. At Berlin he became acquainted with the leaders of the Pietists, and he was an early friend of Tholuck, Müller, and Olshausen. In 1823 he was appointed Chaplain to the Prussian Embassy at Rome: and he there became intimate with the Chevalier de Bunsen, who had much influence on his later theology. In 1828 Rothe became Director of the Theological Seminary at Wittenberg, and then Professor and Seminary Director at Heidelberg, where he remained till the close of his life, with the exception of two years spent at Bonn as Lecturer, in which post he succeeded Dr. Nitzsch. Though remarkable for his modesty and retiring disposition, Rothe exercised a widespread influence among his pupils and contemporaries, and his books hold a foremost place in speculative theological literature. His chief works are: Anfänge der christlichen Kirche und ihrer Verfassung, published in 1837, and Theologische Ethik

[1845-8]. The first is a comprehensive history of the growth of the Christian Church from the Apostolic age to the time of St. Augustine, in which Rothe (himself a Protestant) proves that the tendency of the early Church was towards Romanism, especially in the Nicene age, which the Oxford School represented as the type of primitive Catholicity. The Theologische Ethik is divided into three parts—the doctrine of the good, the doctrine of virtue, and the doctrine of duties. Rothe professes to be a theologian rather than a philosopher, and disclaims the following of any philosophy. He defines piety as the consciousness of God in the soul, which to a pious man overmasters, for the time, all self-consciousness—self-consciousness only grows by degrees out of the primary all-absorbing feeling. He says, “God is as immediately certain to me as myself, because I cannot feel or conceive of the consciousness or the thought of myself in any other way than as immediately connected with the feeling and the thought of God; God is to me the absolutely and immediately certain, and I become first truly certain of myself by means of my certainty of God.” He believes that the Church is destined to permeate all human life with religion, and that when this is accomplished she will become absorbed in the State. With regard to his creed, Rothe was a Protestant as far as he attached himself to any established form of orthodoxy, he regarded the Bible as the unchangeable standard of theology, but said that to him theology was a simple faith in Christ, the “sunrise in history, which alone sheds light over all the objects that fall under our observation.”

Roundheads.—A name given to the Puritans, because they wore their hair cropped close to their heads, in contradistinction to the Cavaliers, who wore long love-locks.

Rousseau, JEAN JACQUES, French philosophical writer (b. at Geneva, June 28th, 1712; d. at Ermenonville, near Paris, June 3rd, 1778), was the son of a watchmaker. His mother died in his infancy, and he was brought up by his aunt. In 1722 he was sent to a school at Bossey, where he remained for two years. He was then sent to a notary's office, but dismissed for inaptness and inaccuracy. He was next apprenticed to an engraver, M. Ducommun, a rough and violent man, under whom Rousseau contracted many wicked habits. He at length escaped in 1728, and journeyed to Confignon, near Geneva, where he was hospitably received by the priest, who was ever on the look-out for one whom he might convert. He was confided to the care of Madame de Warens, a lady living at Annecy, and placed in the monastery of the catechumens at Turin, where he abjured Protestantism simply, as he wrote afterwards in his Confessions, because he could not bear the idea of returning to Geneva, and are restored to their natural liberty, and are not obliged to obey. This book kindled the revolutionary fire both in France and Germany. Emilius, or Education, had a great effect on the religion of France. It is full of Rousseau's deism, and brought about a reaction from the materialism and atheism of the time. Rousseau held that the three first precepts that ought to be instilled into the mind of a child are—a respect for truth, a deep feeling for things of the spirit—a sense of awe, mystery, and sublimity—that he was not to hear the name of a God or Supreme Spirit till his reason had ripened, and a love of justice.

His Confessions, which he had not intended to appear before 1800, but which were published surreptitiously in 1785, contain a full account of his whole life, with all the minutest details. He is very candid about his faults, but seems at the same time to be almost proud of some of them.

Routh, MARTIN JOSEPH, D.D. [b. at South Elmham, in Suffolk, Sept., 1755; d. at Tylehurst, near Reading, Dec., 1854]. He matriculated in 1770 at Queen's College, Oxford, entered the College of St. Mary Magdalen in the following year, was elected a Fellow in 1776, and took the degree of M.A. He was appointed to the office of College Librarian in 1781, became Senior Proctor of the University and Junior Dean of Arts, and was elected President of Magdalen College in 1791. He became Rector of Tylehurst in 1810, and held it, with his Presidency, till his death, employing his time in literary work, which he continued till within the last years of his life. In 1784 he edited Platonis Enthydemus et Gorgias, with notes; in 1814-15 he published three volumes of Reliquiæ Sacre, and in 1832 Scripturæ Ecclesiasticarum Opuscula. Two more volumes of the Reliquiæ Sacre were added in 1846-8, and he published two editions of Bishop Burnet's History of His Own Times.

Rubrica.—Directions in the Prayer Book as to the manner in which the parts of the service are to be performed, from the Latin rubra, "red," because they were formerly written in red ink to distinguish them from the service, which was printed in different type and in black ink. The first service books of the Church seem not to have had any rubrica, but the directions were contained in other books. The first to combine the two seems to have been Burchard, Master of Ceremonies under Innocent VIII., and Alexander VI., whose Pontifical containing the ceremonies and words of the Mass was printed at Rome in 1485.

Rufina and Secunda, SAINTS.—Daughters of a nobleman of the first rank in Rome. They were betrothed to two brothers, and would most likely have married them, but when, in the year 257, Valerian raised a persecution in Rome, the brothers renounced their faith in order to save their property. Rufina and Secunda, not feeling sure that they would have strength of mind to resist the persuasions of their friends, left the town secretly. Armentarius and Verinus were so angry when they found their betrothed had escaped, that they informed against them. The sisters were brought before the Governor, Junius Donatus, and by his direction were beheaded in a wood near Rome. A church was built in the fourth century on the place of their martyrdom, but it was destroyed some years later during an invasion of barbarians. The relics of the sisters were removed to the Church of St. John Lateran at Rome. The 10th of July is dedicated to their memory.

Rufinus, TYRANNIUS, Presbyter of Aquileia [b. at Aquileia about the middle of the fourth century; d. in Sicily, 410]. He was educated at a monastery in Aquileia, and there became acquainted with St. Jerome, who mentions him as one of the most promising students. Rufinus was baptised about 370, and went soon afterwards to Egypt to visit some of the famous hermits living in the deserts; he spent six years in Egypt, and during this time received a letter from St. Jerome full of tenderness and commendation. In 378 he went to Jerusalem, and built a cell upon the Mount of Olives, in which he lived for nearly twenty years. He is famous on account of his Latin translation of Origen and other Greek writers, his commentaries on Hosea, Joel, and Amos, and his bitter contest with St. Jerome, this was caused by the latter's disapproval of his translation of Origen's De Principiis, and, though at one time they became reconciled, the contest broke out afresh when Rufinus returned to Rome in 397. He lived for some time before his death at Aquileia; but was cited to appear before Anastasius, Bishop of Rome, and, failing to do so, his writings were condemned, and he was degraded from the rank of Presbyter. He retired to Sicily, and died there. He translated the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, and continued it to the death of Theodosius. He also translated the Orations of St. Gregory Nazianzen, and the Rules of St. Basil. His translations are paraphrases rather than literal versions.

Ruinart, THIERRY.—A Benedictine monk of the Congregation of St. Maur [b. at Rheims, 1657. d. at the Monastery of Hautvillers, near that city, 1709]. He entered the Congregation of St. Maur in 1674, and went in 1682 to St. Germain-des-Prés, where he became the pupil of Mabillon, and worked with him upon the last volumes of the history of the Order of St. Benedict. His chief works were Acta Primorum Martyrum; and Historia Persecutionis Vandalicæ, which some believe to have been the work of an African particulars, notably that of the doctrine of the Trinity. The Russians deny the double Procession of the Holy Ghost. [Philosop. Conventions.] The worship of the Virgin is not so common as in Italy or Spain, but the invocation of the Saints is quite as usual. The laity communicate in both kinds with the priest, but with this difference, that while he partakes of each separately, the laity receive the bread soaked in the wine. The Russians take their fundamental doctrines from the Bible and the first of the seven General Councils of the Church. The number of Sacraments recognised by them is seven, namely, Baptism, Chrism, the Eucharist, Orders, Confession, Matrimony, and the Unction of the Sick. In the latter there is again a difference from the Roman Catholic idea of the same service. In the former unction is administered only at the certain approach of death, whereas in Russia prayers are added for the recovery of the patient. There are three orders of clergy: bishops, priests, and deacons, but numerous sub-divisions exist in each order. It will suffice if we mention those of the bishops, which are three in number: First, the metropolitans, of which there are only three in Russia; second, the archbishops; third, the bishops. The lower clergy are paid by the State, and although their incomes are for the most part very small, they manage, by total exemption from taxation, to live. They are forbidden to marry after their ordination, but there is no law against their keeping their wives if they should have been married while still laymen. The number of members of this Church is said to be as great as 64,000,000, of which 15,000,000 are sectarian dissenters. The ritual of the service is elaborate in the extreme; a description of a festival service has been published in Dr. Pinkerton's account of his visit to Russia. Great superstition prevails, especially amongst the lower classes, and this is fostered by the priests. Image worship, or, to speak more correctly, picture worship, is a great feature of the religion of the people, many thinking it utterly impossible to say a prayer unless they have a picture either of the Saviour or of the Virgin before them. A few years ago a book written by the late Mr. William Palmer was published, with a preface by Cardinal Newman. The author not only fully describes what he saw in Russia, but freely gives his views and impressions received while on a visit to the country. He went with the idea that it would be possible in time to unite the Russian and Anglican Churches, a union very much desired by many Russians; but returned with the conviction that with such an utter dissimilarity of opinion on many vital matters, such a union was quite impracticable.

Rutherford, SAMUEL, a Covenanter, celebrated for his piety and learning, was born at Nisbet, in Roxburghshire, about 1600, and educated at Edinburgh University. In 1627 he was appointed minister of Anworth, where he worked unceasingly among his people. In 1636 he was banished for preaching against the Articles of Perth, and went to Aberdeen, but returned to his charge on the overthrow of Episcopacy in 1638. In the next year he became Professor of Divinity at St. Andrews, and in 1643 came to London as one of the Scotch Commissioners to the Westminster Assembly. He did so much for the cause of Presbyterianism, that Milton wrote against him in The New Forces of Conscience under the Long Parliament. At the Restoration Rutherford was in great disfavour. The Lex Rex, a book which he had published in 1644, was burnt before his windows, and he was summoned before Parliament; but he died March 20th, 1661, before the time appointed for his appearance.

Among Rutherford's works are The Due Right of Presbytery [1644], The Trial and Triumph of Faith [1645], The Divine Right of Church Government [1646], The Covenant of Life [1655], Civil Policy [1657], and Life of Grace [1659].

Sabaites. [SABAS, ST.]

Sabaoth.—A Hebrew word, meaning "hosts" or "armies." It occurs in the fifth verse of the Te Deum, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth." Some doubt has been expressed as to the reference; the general opinion is that the angels or angelic hosts are meant, or the stars, which are often spoken of as the host of heaven. One critic believes that it means the hosts of Israel, and others that it is a general reference to all created things.

Sabas, St., Abbot, was born at Mutalasca, in Cappadocia, in 439. At a very early age he entered the monastery at Flavina, not far from his native town. After living here ten years, he went to Palestine, and, taking St. Euthymius as his model, began adopting this Saint's custom of living in a cell quite alone, far away from all his fellow-men. But Euthymius, thinking this too severe a trial for a young man, advised him to take a cell near Jerusalem, which formed one of a sort of cluster of hermitages. After the death of Euthymius, the discipline of the monastery was relaxed, and Sabas went to a desert, where he remained four years without speaking to a single soul. At the end of that time, having had several applications from different men to be allowed to share his solitude, he agreed to form a small cenobium. He had never been admitted into priest's orders, and as the want of a priest was severely felt in the community, he was ordained by Ballust,

There have been some who, taking the strictest views of Sabbath observance, have held that the observance of the seventh day is still standing; such are the Seventh-day Baptists. And others who do not go this length maintain that the substitution of the first for the seventh day being made, the obligation to observe that day as the Sabbath strictly remains as before. Some hold that the substitution, though not mentioned in the New Testament, must have been by our Lord's command; others, that the day is fixed by apostolical precedent, and that its manner of observance is a matter of ecclesiastical authority.

In the New Testament there are six distinct notices which relate to "the first day of the week." On that day our Lord rose from the dead, and He appeared to His disciples on the same day five times. After eight days, that is, on the first day of the week, He appeared to the eleven when assembled together [John xx.]. The Pentecostal Feast that year fell on the first day of the week, and on that day the Holy Ghost was given. In Acts xx. 7 the disciples come together on the first day of the week to break bread. In 1 Cor. xvi. 2, St. Paul bids the Corinthians lay by for the week on the first day of the week. It is matter of dispute whether by the Lord's Day in Rev. i. 10 is meant the first day of the week or Easter Sunday, or the Jewish Sabbath. These passages seem enough to show, to any reasonable thinker, that the Apostles observed this day. But there is no mention of cessation from labour, nor of any connection with the Sabbath, nor is the observance required of the Gentiles under the decrees of the Council of Jerusalem.

The ante-Nicene Fathers are unanimous as to the weekly observance of the day. Thus in the Epistle of Barnabas: "We celebrate the eighth day with joy, on which Jesus rose from the dead." Justin Martyr speaks of Christians assembling on "the day called the day of the Sun." Ignatius writes: "No longer observing Sabbaths, we keep the Lord's Day." Irenæus is the first who speaks of cessation from labour. He says that reaping and gathering into barns is forbidden on that day. Tertullian too says [A.D. 202]: "On the Lord's day of resurrection we ought to abstain from all habit and labour of anxiety, putting off even our business, lest we give place to the devil." But he also calls it a day "on which we allow ourselves to be joyous." The edict of Constantine, in 321, decreed that all business and employment, except agriculture, should cease on "the honoured day of the sun." The Emperor Leo, in 469, included agriculture in this prohibition.

During the Middle Ages Sunday was served as a holy day, and it is curious that even the Waldenses and the Lollards came to objections that this was an infringement of Christian liberty. The same line was taken by the great Reformers. Tyndall declared that no holy day was needed if the people could be taught without it. Luther repudiated the obligation so long as it rested on the Fourth Commandment: "If it be set upon a Jewish foundation, then I bid you work, ride, dance on it." Calvin used to play at bowls on the Sunday. The consequence was that a gross and open disregard of the day spread itself throughout Europe. So it was in England also. Even the itinerant preachers sent out by Archbishop Parker betook themselves, after the German fashion, to "tabling, carding, shooting, and bowling." At Kenilworth dancing took place on Sundays. Then those who could not assert the authority of the Church to make holy days, fell back on the Fourth Commandment. It was genuine reverence for religion which led the Puritans to call for greater strictness. The Book of Sports, published in 1618, it should be remembered, in behalf of James I., was not intended as a secularisation of the Lord's Day, but a check upon that. No one was allowed to join in the games but those who had previously attended the Church service. But the licence gave offence, and Archbishop Abbot refused to have it read. The whole subject was bound up with that of Puritan strictness, and the Pilgrim Fathers forbade travelling, cooking, shaving, making beds on the Sabbath. It was part of King James's legislation which fined a man for not going to church on Sunday, and there are many old statutes tending in the same direction which have fallen into disuse. The writer of an interesting article in the Guardian of Dec. 2nd, 1885, points out that the first statute of the reign of Charles I. was directed against meetings of people out of their own parishes "for any sports or pastimes, or any bear-baiting, bull-baiting, interludes," etc. In 1627 carriers were forbidden to travel on the Lord's Day under a penalty of 20s., and butchers were forbidden under a penalty of 6s. 8d. to sell meat. But the law known as the Lord's Day Act was passed in 1676, and forbade every tradesman, artificer, workman, or labourer, to exercise any work of their ordinary calling, works of necessity or charity alone excepted. The fine was, and still remains, on the Statute Book as 5s. for each offence. The interpretation of this law by the judges has produced some anomalies. "It was quickly noticed that the work to be punished was work done in the exercise of a man's ordinary calling. So a horse may be sold on a Sunday, but if it is sold by a horse-dealer the bargain cannot legally be enforced, and, strictly speaking, the horse-dealer may be fined. . . . A farmer is not liable for making hay on a Sunday, but, strange as it may seem, his labourers may be punished for the same act." The Lord's Day Act has been modified by an Act of 1871, which provides that no prosecution can be instituted except by or with the consent in

be multifarious and complicated aspects of modern life—to servants especially most of all to public servants—seems to be most pressing problem connected with Christian Sabbath at the present day.

Sabbatians.—A sect of the NOVATIANS. They took their name from Sabbatius, a presbyter ordained by Marcian, who attempted to bring some Jewish rites into the Christian Church.

The Sabbatians were among the condemned by the Council of Constance in 1418.

Sabbatum Magnum ["the great Sabbath."]—A name given to Easter Eve, and observed as the most solemn fast in the year, not excepting Good Friday. It was kept throughout the night till the supposed time of the Resurrection, when the early Christians used to assemble for prayer and reading the Scriptures. It was also customary to baptize persons on this day, that they might be ready to receive the Easter Communion; and persons who had been excommunicated, and had since repented, were re-admitted to all the sacraments of the Church.

Sabbatini. [MENDICANS.]

Sabellius was the author of the Sabellianism. Very little is known of his life.

He was born at Ptolemais, in Libya, the third century, and afterwards perhaps, the bishop of that city. He held some of his heretical views to Nestorius, whose disciple he was, and began to propagate his errors about A.D. 280. They are not out till the fifth century.

He denied the doctrine of the Trinity, holding that God is Unipersonal, and names Father, Son, and Holy Ghost designate the same person in different relations. As the Father, God created the world; as the Son, He redeemed it; as the Holy Spirit, He sanctifies the elect. These three persons, he said, are no more different persons than the body, soul, and spirit of man are different parts of the same person.

A deduction from this view is that the Father suffered on the Cross, hence the Son is often included among the Persons of the Trinity. Later, the Sabellians became divided into two sections—the Low Sabellians held that Jesus Christ was not Divine, but a mere "energy" or emanation from God. They all accepted the Scriptures, and acknowledged also some apocryphal Gospels, the chief of which was The Gospel to the Hebrews.

Sabellianism was the cause of the introduction of the word person in describing the doctrine of the Trinity. The word was not used before in that connection.

Sabbas, St.—Very little is known of this saint, except that he was a monk under the persecution of Maximian. He was Bishop of Amisium, and was arrested with others, and kept in prison till the arrival of the Governor, Venustianus, who ordered that both of Sabbas's hands should be cut off, and that his two deacons—Marcellus and Exuperantius—should be beaten with clubs and torn with iron nails. Venustianus was later converted to Christianity, and was immediately expelled from his office. Under the rule of his successor, Lucius, Sabbas was cruelly put to death at Spoleto. His festival is kept on Dec. 30th.

Sacerdotalism [from sacerdos, a "priest"].

—The word is applied to that view of the priesthood which, accepting the doctrine of a sacrifice in the Holy Eucharist, regards the priest as the minister of that sacrifice. Opposed to this is the view that the priest is an elder of the congregation, and that there is no sacrifice in the Lord's Supper—only a memorial of the death of the Saviour. [PAUPER; LORD'S SUPPER; RITUALISM.]

Sacheverell, Henry, was born in Wiltshire in 1672, and was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow, and where he took his M.A., B.D., and D.D. degrees. He seems to have been a dull man, but obtained a marvellous notoriety through two sermons which he preached in 1709—one at Derby and the other in St. Paul's Cathedral. They asserted strong Tory principles and the duty of "non-resistance," which so angered the Whig Parliament that they brought him to trial, and he was suspended for three years, and his sermons were burnt by the common hangman. But the victory which they gained ruined the Whigs. Sacheverell became a popular hero and martyr, and when his suspension was expired he was surrounded with great rejoicings. He preached before the House of Commons on May 29th, and became Rector of St. Andrews, Holborn, where he died in 1724.

Sachs, Hans [b. 1494, d. 1578], a Nürnberg shoemaker, who has been called "the prince and patriarch of the master-singers." He is said to have composed upwards of six thousand poems, etc., some of which had a great influence on the Reformation. Some of the most famous are Die Wittenbergische Nachtigall, which is a transcription of Luther's translation of the Psalms: Die englischen Kinder Ees; Hausstus; etc.

Sack, BASTARD OF THE.—A division of the Boni homines, or PERFECTI [q.v.], founded in France in 1200, so called from the sack which they used as a garment. They increased rapidly for a time both in France and England, but were dissolved in 1275, probably because they had adopted heretical doctrines.

There was also an Order of nuns of the same name founded by Saint Louis in 1261, but it was dissolved within a few years. As late as 1357 hempen sacks were worn in London by an Order of nuns.

ly from the Jansenists; and those who themselves particularly to this work nicknamed Cordeliers or Cordeliers. Pope Clement XIII. sanctioned the institution of the feast of the Sacred Heart, foundress was canonised as lately as 1856. It is now kept on the Friday or Sunday or the octave of Corpus Christi. An Order of nuns, Dames du Sacré as founded in Paris, and branches of spread rapidly; but as they followed rules, they shared in the general ex- of the Jesuits.

Sacrifice.—The worship given to God by the offering of some victim. Sacrifices are offered by the fathers of families, eldest persons in every house; but afterwards were ordained to that function. "Skins of skins" with which God clothed the parents have been held by some of the most divines to indicate the Divine origin of sacrifice. But the first direct instance of sacrifice is in Gen. iv.: Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of thereof, while Cain offered of "the fruit of the ground." The second is that of Noah, when he came out of the ark, and offered to God for his deliverance. Scripture mentions likewise of the sacrifices by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The sacrifice of the Mosaic dispensation were instituted by the institution of the Passover, was followed by a code set down according to the order he had received from God. After the appointment of the priesthood, the sacrifices were only offered by the priest in the Tabernacle or the Temple.

Before the victim or beast designated for sacrifice was slain, the person for whom it was offered laid his hand upon its head, and made a public confession of his sins, and then the beast was slain, flayed, and divided into parts. The priests took the entrails and sprinkled with it the four horns of the altar, and poured the rest at the foot of it. If the sacrifice were an holocaust, the burnt-offering, the victim was consumed by fire; but in other sacrifices the entrails and fat only were burnt, the remainder being eaten by the priests, the meantime singing hymns of praise to God, entreating Him to accept the sacrifice. The parts that were not burnt were used by the priests. The law as laid down in Leviticus distinguishes three main classes of sacrifice, the Expiatory (the sin offering), the Impetratory or Supplicatory (the burnt offering), and the Eucharistic (the peace offering). These three classes are observable in the Temple. Sin Offerings were made at the Feast of Atonement as well as on the day of atonement at each new moon [Num. xxviii.]. There were daily Meat Offerings of flour, wine, besides the shewbread renewed the special offerings on the Sabbath and great festivals, and the first-fruits at Pentecost and harvest; and there was a daily Burnt Offering, doubled on the Sabbath, and special at the great festivals. To these must be added the morning and evening incense, and the offerings made on special occasions; as, on the presentation of the first-born, the cleansing of leprosy, the fulfilment of Nazarite vows, etc.

From remotest times, the heathen nations sacrificed to their gods to propitiate them, but they also introduced the sacrifice of human beings. In the Scripture we have the burning of victims to Moloch, and the causing children to pass through the fire to Baal, and it was even so in European countries, in the worship offered to Saturn and Jupiter; Dionysius of Halicarnassus speaks of it in the first ages at Tyre, Carthage, and Italy. Plutarch, in his book of Superstition, mentions the sacrificing of children to Saturn; and Pliny tells us the custom had been observed in Rome. It was practised in our own country in Druidical times. We cannot but recognise in all such sacrifices a deep and unconquerable sense in mankind of alienation from God, and the sense of the soul that it needs forgiveness. How this need has been met to the full Christians make no question. [WORK OF CHRIST.]

Sacrilege.—The act of violating sacred things, or subjecting them to profanation; or the desecration of objects consecrated to God. The following were the chief acts of sacrilege punished by the ancient Church:—Accepting the Eucharist from any one other than a priest, the seizure of sacred property, the robbing of churches or graves, the abuse of sacred vessels and altars by employing them for unhallowed purposes, the plundering and misappropriation of alms and donations, a bishop's delivering over a monastery to spoliation, and, according to some, the abstaining from the cup in Holy Communion. There were also acts classed as sacrilege, but which have not been so called by conciliar decree, as, not consuming the Eucharist in church, giving the Eucharist to the dead, misuse of the chrism for medicinal or other purposes, drawing crosses on the ground where they may be trodden upon, etc. Committers of sacrilege were often put to death, and were sometimes ranked with murderers, and sometimes with heretics, felons, thieves, and wizards. Those who had stolen church property were thrice ordered to make restitution, and if they still refused were excommunicated and anathematised.

Sacring Bell or Sancto Bell.—A small bell rung during the celebration of Mass in the Roman Church, to draw the attention of the congregation to the more solemn parts of the service. It is also called the Saints', or Mass, Bell. In former times, a bell hung in a turret outside the church, was rung at the elevation of the Host, to Protestantism, and lastly Saint-Simonianism. So far as the nature of this new or Saint-Simonian religion was defined, its peculiarity was to rest on two principles—the one relating to the end after which humanity was to strive, the other to the means whereby this end was to be attained. "The most rapid possible amelioration, physical and moral, of the condition of the class the most numerous and poor"—such was the first principle, defining the end prescribed by the new religion for all the efforts and labours of humanity. To the attainment of this end, however, a right organisation of society was indispensable; and the principle of this organisation or reconstruction was formul- ated thus—"To each man a vocation ac- cording to his capacity, and to each capacity a recompense according to its works." His last act was to found Le Producteur, a journal which was to proclaim this new religion. The Saint-Simonians became extinct in 1832, but there are still traces of their doctrine among the modern French school of thought.

Saints, INVOCATION OF. [INVOCATION OF SAINTS.]

Sales, FRANCIS DE. [FRANCIS DE SALES.]

Salisbury, BISHOPRIC OF.—The seat of this diocese was originally Old Sarum, the Saxon town of Searobyrig, to which place the See was removed in 1075 by Bishop Herman, who in 1058 had become bishop of the united dioceses of SHERBORNE [q.v.] and Ramsbury. He commenced to build a cathedral here, which was completed by his successor, Os- mund. In 1220 Bishop Poore removed the seat of his diocese to Salisbury. In 1542 Dorsetshire was transferred to the newly- formed See of Bristol; in 1836 Berkshire was joined to the diocese of Oxford. Gloucester and Bristol were united under one bishop, and Berkshire was restored to Salisbury.

Bishop Richard le Poore, in 1220, set about building a cathedral, and continued it till he was translated to Durham in 1229. He founded also a Cistercian nunnery in his native place of Tarrant, in Dorsetshire. Amongst Eng- lish cathedrals it shares, along with St. Paul's, the characteristic of being built all in one period, the first half of the thirteenth century. The lofty spire, upon which the repute of Salisbury Cathedral is rested, seems to have been no part of the original design, and was added some time after by an unknown archi- tect, who nearly overtaxed the capability of the existing building, which was not designed to bear such a weight. Salisbury is peculiarly rich in the survival of consecration crosses, which in mediæval days were carved or painted on the walls of churches. There were no monks at Salisbury—a fact of which we are reminded by the choir-stalls being all placed east of the transept. One curiosity present form and received its name in 1845, when the name army came military. Prayer was termed knee-drill, a general; evangelists, officers; and cadets. A semi-military attire was worn, barracks were built instead of separate houses, and when the army went out to battle by storm, it was with banners and bands of music. The noisiest drums, brass, etc.) is also employed in meetings, and other proceedings of a national character. The object is to train people who would not enter church and for this cause the officers, male and female, visit public-houses, prisons, etc., and air meetings are held. Its possession of property was not undisputed, and an army was formed which was called the Army of the Lord. An account of the doings of the Army of the Lord, their expenses, etc., is given in a weekly paper called the War Cry, number of corps or stations in March, 1885, did to have been 983, the number of villages 512. Services are held in 562 villages, number of them every week is 16,000. 10,000 people are said to be reached every week. The weekly circulation of the War Cry and of The Little Paper for children, is over 550,000. The income from all sources in 1885, from trade receipts, was £76,168 17s. 6d. The trading account in connection with the trade headquarters showed £12,754 10s. 9d. from sale of books, £24,137 10s. 9d. from sale of the official journals, £19,636 10s. 9d. from sales effected in the outfit department, and £6,397 1s. 2d. from the sale of the net profit of these transactions was £12,754 10s. 9d. There were 802 corps in the kingdom, against 637 in 1884, and 1 against 273. Four specially commissioned men are travelling about the country with preachers. Their literature 23,470,860 publications in 13 languages.

Salvation of Infants.—The salvation of infants is definitely asserted by the Church of England in the Liturgy. "It is by God's Word that children which are dying before they commit actual sin are undoubtedly saved." So runs the prayer at the end of the Baptismal Service. It is drawn from a declaration published in Cranmer's Institution of a Christian 37. In the original form the words "wherefore not" were appended. It was omitted when they were struck out. The rubric was one of the heaviest complained of by the Dissenters. It was declared that if every other word to which objection was taken away, he still would conform so long as this rubric should remain. There is no opinion expressed in any part of the Church of England as to the salvation of children dying unbaptised. Probably the reason for the insertion of this rubric was to declare that Confirmation was not essential to baptised infants. Bishop Bethell in his treatise on Regeneration says that it was the common opinion of the early Church that unbaptised infants were not saved [resting the view upon John iii. 5], but that this opinion did not involve any cruel idea of pain or suffering for little ones deprived of this Sacrament. It rather supposed them to be as though they had never been, whereas they might, by the care of their parents, have been reckoned among the followers of the Lamb. But this doctrine has found little favour among English divines, and the teaching of the great Hooker is probably an expression of the general opinion of Churchmen: "Grace is not absolutely tied unto Sacraments, and such is the lenity of God that unto things impossible he bindeth no man" [Eccl. Pol., vi. 60]. It was this judgment of charity which induced the compilers of the Service "for Baptism of those of riper years" to qualify the conclusion which they draw from John iii. 5 as to the necessity of baptism, by the words "where it may be had."

Salve Regina.—An antiphon sung in the Roman Church from Trinity to Advent, after Lauds and Compline. It was the earliest antiphon of the Virgin, and was first put into the Breviary by Cardinal Quignon, and transferred to the Roman Breviary by Pius V. It is said to have been composed by Contractus, a Benedictine monk of the eleventh century, while the last clause, O clemens, O pia, O dulcis Virgo Maria, was added by St. Bernard.

Salvianus, a presbyter who lived in Gaul in the fifth century. He wrote numerous works, of which some are still extant, as De Avaritia [440], De Gubernatione Dei, or De Providentia [451]. His works were first collected and published by Pithœux, in Paris, 1580.

Samaritans.—A mixed people, who formed a sect among the Jews, and who inhabited the region between Judæa and Galilee. They were partly the remains of the ten tribes left in Samaria by Shalmaneser, King of Assyria, when he had carried their brethren away captive, and partly Babylonians, Cutheans, and others, who had come to supply the place of the conquered people. These had been converted from idolatry by the Jews; but on the return of the inhabitants from the Babylonish captivity, the Jews declined to mix with them, though united with them in religion. They attempted to prevent the Jews from rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, and, failing in this, they built a temple on Mount Gerizim exclusively for their own worship. A few of the race still exist, scattered in Egypt, at Damascus, and at Gaza. They profess great strictness in observing the Mosaic law, but are regarded by the Jews as heretics, as they accept only the Pentateuch. They possess some very valuable manuscripts, among them an ancient copy of the Pentateuch, written in Phœnician characters, or, according to some, the ancient Hebrew characters in use before the Babylonish Captivity. There are some differences between this Pentateuch and that of the Jews, but they are mostly, no doubt, owing to the inaccuracy of transcribers. Their worship is like that of the Jews, but they always take off their shoes before entering the synagogue.

Samosatians. [PAUL OF SAMOSATA.]

San Benito.—The garments worn by the victims of the Inquisition at the Auto de Fé. They had devils and flames painted on them. If the victim was to be burnt alive, the flames pointed upwards; if not, downwards.

Sanchez, THOMAS [b. at Cordova in 1551; d. at Granada, 1610], a Spanish Jesuit. He studied theology and law, and his book De Sacramento Matrimonii became famous, and would have been valuable had it not been for its intolerable coarseness.

Sanchuniathon.—A Phœnician philosopher and historian, who is supposed to have lived at the time of, or before, the Trojan War. Of his works nothing remains but fragments, quoted by Eusebius and Theodoret, the first of whom speaks of him as an accurate historian who wrote a valuable work on the history of the Jews. Sanchuniathon is mentioned by Porphyry, Athenæus, and Suidas, and Eusebius says that one of his works was translated into Greek by Philo. Modern writers have said that the fragments were forgeries, either by Philo or by Porphyry, accepted by Eusebius as genuine, and it is now doubted by many whether he ever existed. If so, it is still probable that he lived at a later period than has been generally assigned to him.

Sancroft, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1616, at Fressingfield, in Suffolk. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow in 1642, but was ejected for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. He spent some years in France and Italy, and on returning to England at the Restoration became successively University Preacher [1660], Master of his College [1662], Dean of York [1663], and of St. Paul's [1664]. The cathedral having received much damage during the Commonwealth, he had set himself to repair it when it was burnt down in 1666, and he had to turn his mind to its entire rebuilding. He also rebuilt the deanery. In 1677 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He was committed to the Tower, together with six other bishops, in 1687, for refusing to read the Declaration of Indulgence, but they were all acquitted. Upon James's withdrawing himself in 1688, he concurred with the Lords spiritual and temporal in declaration to the Prince of Orange for Parliament, with due liberty to Pro Dissenters. But at the accession of V and Mary he refused to swear the allegiance, and was deprived of his bishopric. He retired to Fressingfield he died in 1693. He wrote Madras Familiar Letters, Predestinated Ties sermons. [NONJURORS.]

Sancta Sanctis.—An exhortation found in all Eastern Liturgies, follow Consecration Prayer and preceding communion. The words in the Liturgy James are as follow :

The Priest says secretly :

Holy Lord, that restest in the bosom, by the word of Thy grace, and by the will Thy most Holy Spirit, for Thou, Lord, I say holy, for I am holy. Lord our God, prehensible Word of God, our Father eternal, indivisible, with the Father and Ghost, receive the pure hymn, in Thy spotless sacrifice, with the cherubim and from me a sinner crying and saying, create the oblation and offer aloud! Holy & holy person.

The People say :

One Holy, one Lord, Jesus Christ, in the God the Father, to Whom be glory for ever.

The Deacon says :

For the remission of our sins, and the tion of our souls, and for every afflicted troubled soul that needeth the pity and help and for the conversion of them that have the healing of them that are sick, the life them that are in captivity, the rest of us and brethren that have fallen asleep before us pray earnestly and say, Lord have mercy.

People :

Lord have mercy.

Sanctification.—The work of the Spirit whereby man is renewed in the of God, and enabled to die to sin. It upon the holiness of God, who is absolutely pure in Himself, but comm His purity to His people through the Sanctification is not to be confounded with justification, which is forgiveness of sin, by man stands before God pure in life through an act of God's mercy. Sanctification is a gradual progress towards holiness, ing Justification, and changing the life through the power of the Holy Justification removes the guilt, and Sanctification the power, of sin : Justification d us from the avenging wrath of God Sanctification conforms us to His Nevertheless, the two are inseparably connected in the promises of God, and doctrines and promises of the Gospel.

Sandals form part of the bishop's vest- ments in the Roman Catholic Church. They are first mentioned by Amalarius of Metz as part of the bishop's dress, and the writer men- tions the fact that the bishop's sandals differed from those of the priest, as the former wore them in travelling. At the time of Innocent III. we find that priests no longer wore sandals. They are regarded by Rabanus Maurus as a symbol that the pastors should reveal the truth only to those of their flock, concealing it from infidels; the sandal being made so that only the under part of the foot was covered, and the upper part revealed.

Sandemanians [originally called Glass- ites, by which name they are still known in Scotland].—A sect founded about 1728 by John Glass, a Scotchman, and originally a minister of the Presbyterian Church. He was sus- pended by the Synod of Angus and Mearns for holding heretical opinions, which he published in a book called The Testimony of the King of Martyrs. Among other views, he held that national establishments of religion are inconsistent with the teaching of the New Testament, and that there ought to be no connection between Church and State. His doctrines were further developed by his son- in-law, ROBERT SANDEMAN [b. at Perth, 1718; d. in America, 1771], who maintained the necessity of justification by faith, but at the same time defined faith as a simple belief in the Divine testimony, differing in no way from belief in any ordinary human testimony. Sandeman established the sect in London and America, and it exists to the present day; it never numbered many followers, and now they are probably under two thousand. The Sandemanians have revived several customs of the primitive Church, such as abstinence from blood and from things strangled, the holding of love-feasts, the kiss of charity, washing of each other's feet, community of goods, the use of the lot, and the celebration of the Eucharist weekly. They practise mutual exhortation, and believe in a plurality of elders or pastors, who are set apart from amongst themselves, engagement in trade being no obstacle. The late celebrated Pro- fessor Michael Faraday was a Sandemanian.

Sanderson, ROBERT, Bishop of Lincoln [b. in Yorkshire, 1587; d. at Lincoln, in January, 1663]. Educated at Lincoln Col- lege, Oxford, and was made Logic Reader of that college in 1608; afterwards became a Fellow and Proctor of the University. Having taken orders, Sanderson was appointed Prebendary of Southwell in 1615 and of Lincoln in 1629; rector of a living in Lincolnshire, and, on the recommendation of Archbishop Laud, Chaplain to Charles I. in 1631. It is said that he was the King's favourite preacher, for Charles was a great admirer of casuistry, in which Sanderson excelled; and being with the Court at Oxford in 1636 he was made a D.D. In 1642 he obtained the Regius Professorship of Divinity at Oxford, but was prevented from entering on the appointment through the outbreak of the Civil Wars, and in 1648 was ejected by the Visitors commissioned by Parliament. He accompanied the King to Hampton Court and the Isle of Wight. In his younger days he had been somewhat of a Puritan and a Calvinist, but his opinions changed later, and in 1661 he wrote a treatise called Episcopacy, as established by Law in England, not prejudicial to Regal Power. After the Restoration he was made Bishop of Lincoln, and assisted at the Savoy Conference; and in the short time which elapsed before his death he did much towards increasing the value of the poorer benefices in his diocese. Sanderson was noted as an antiquary, but was chiefly famed for his casuistry. He wrote De Juramenti Obligatione [1661], Nine Cases of Conscience [1678], Logicæ Artis Compendium, De Obligatione Conscientiæ, and other works. Bishop Sanderson lives permanently in the Anglican Church, through the Preface prefixed to the Book of Common Prayer: "It hath been the wisdom," etc. This Preface is his work, and is deeply interesting as expressing the position taken by the Church of England at its restoration after the Revolution. It glances at the history of the past, and reviews each of the revisions, asserting that, all through, the essentials have continued the same. One phrase used in this Preface has become celebrated, "the middle way between two extremes." A countless number of preachers and essayists have adduced this as expressing the position of the Church of England between Romanism and Calvinism; but an examination of the context will show that the Bishop is merely expressing the moderation and calmness of the revisions; the retention of fundamental principles, the stiffness which refuses any reform. And the objects of revision which he declares are sought are, the preservation of peace and unity, the procuring of reverence and exciting of piety and devotion, and the cutting off of occasion of cavil. It will probably be considered by those who study the document most carefully, that it places Sanderson in a highly favourable light.

Sandys, Edwin, Archbishop of York, the son of a gentleman of Lancashire, was born in 1528 and died in 1588. He was educated at Cambridge, and while there was converted to Protestantism. In course of made Master of Catherine Hall Vice-Chancellor of the University Duke of Northumberland married with his troops, with the intention Lady Jane Grey on the throne. to be at Cambridge on Sunday ordered Sandys to preach before he did, taking for his text Joshua Duke was much pleased, and promotion, but within a very few both in the Tower. By the influential friends he was liberated of four months, crossed to Calcutta stayed there till the accession of Elizabeth. She made him Bishop in 1559. He was translated to London in 1570, and thence to York in 1576. His literary work was a volume of sermons.

Sanhedrim. — The supreme tribunal of the Jews, instituted by the Maccabees. According to tradition, Moses founded it when he called the elders to assist him in the judging the children of Israel. There is no satisfactory evidence as to the number of members of the Sanhedrim, but it was usually composed of seventy members, the president, who was usually a high priest. They had power over all civil and spiritual matters, and were assisted by the priests, elders, or heads of the families, and scribes or doctors of the law. They sat in a semicircle, with the president in the centre; they assembled in the Temple, or some other building in the immediate vicinity of the Temple. At the trial of our Lord they sat in the palace. This council became extinct in 70 A.D.

Sardica, Council of. — According to tradition, Crates and Sozomen, this Council was held in 347, but it probably took place at the end of 343. It was called by the Emperor Constantine for the purpose of deciding the dispute of the Arian controversy, and of settling the breach they had caused between the Eastern and Western Churches. There were only seventy-six of the Eastern bishops, and more than three hundred of the Western. It was impossible to effect a union, and the meeting served rather to widen the breach. The bishops of the West demanded that Athanasius and his colleagues should be allowed to attend the Council, but the Eastern bishops refused to grant this, a total rupture took place between the parties. The Western bishops continued to hold their Council at Sardica; the Eastern withdrew to Constantinople, in Thrace, so that the only Council which was to completely sever the fellowship between the two Churches. The Western bishops were unwilling to add anything to the Council of Nicæa, or to form a new Confession of Faith, and they made twenty or twenty-one canons.

eral discipline of the Church, the fourth which, according to the Roman Catholics, is the principal step to the sovereignty of the Pope in the Church, by ruling that an appeal might be made to the Bishop of Rome in quality of supreme judge. It is doubtful, however, whether the Council intended to do more than confer on Julius, who was then pope, a personal privilege, as an expedient for the sake of trouble and division. The Trullan council adopted the canons of the Council of Nice for the Eastern as well as the Western Church, though the division prevents it from being considered an œcumenical council.

Sarpi, PAOLO, generally called Fra Paolo, was born in Venice in 1552, died in 1623. He early showed great talents, and the scope of his learning must have been wonderful. He became one of the Order of the Servites, and at the age of twenty-seven was made Provincial. The quarrel between the Commonwealth of Venice and Pope Paul V. was the cause of much anxiety to him. He denied the right of the Pope to interfere in secular matters, and asserted that Papal excommunication was not valid so long as it was perfectly just. He was summoned to appear at Rome, and on his refusal the Pope excommunicated him. But this did not affect him much, for he continued, with his tongue and pen, to assert the rights of the Commonwealth. The Pope's rage gained him many enemies, and once he was set upon in the street by five men, who wounded him severely, though not fatally. Although not a Protestant, he warmly urged the reformation of the Church, and he was in correspondence with the ablest leaders of the Reformation. In 1607 a truce was concluded between the Commonwealth of Venice and Rome, and the ban of excommunication was removed from Fra Paolo. He was always in disfavour notwithstanding, and after his death Urban VIII., fearing that the people looked upon him as a saint and were in the habit of praying at his tomb, sent to forbid it. His writings are numerous, but the most celebrated is his History of the Council of Trent, which first appeared in 1619. It is written from an anti-Roman point of view, and might, if not the work of a Protestant. It has been translated into English, French, and

USE. [USES.]

Satan is a Hebrew word signifying "accuser," and the name is found in Zech. iii., Ps. cix. The doctrine of his personality seems undoubtedly more clearly taught in the later than in the earlier books of the Bible, and the gloss which is put upon the New Testament teaching, implying that his personality is merely a Hebrew form of expressing an "impersonation," is one which certainly does considerable violence to the letter of Scripture. The history of the origin of evil and of the fall of Satan from heaven is but dimly revealed to us. More of our popular theology than we are commonly aware of is derived from Milton's magnificent poem. But though we are left greatly in the dark as to the Fall of the Devil, we are in none as to his works. Let it be granted, in the words of Archbishop Trench, that "he is only known to us through his temptations, through the evil suggestions which he causes to rise up out of the deep of our hearts, through the fiery darts with which he seeks to set on fire in us the whole course of nature . . . so that for all practical purposes the words of St. James, 'Resist the devil and he will flee from you,' might be translated into such language as this: Strive manfully against temptations and you have God's promise and pledge that these, instead of overcoming you, shall be overcome by you." But the temptations are real and certain enough. The doctrine of the personality of the Tempter is nowhere asserted in the Church Creeds, and some English divines have declined to affirm it dogmatically. But the language of Scripture and of Christ throws a very serious responsibility upon those who deny it. Kingsley in one of his vigorous sentences roundly declares that the denial is one of the most dangerous of modern heresies, and that the devil's latest device is "shamming dead."

Other names for Satan are DEVIL [Gr. diabolus, "slanderer" or "accuser"]; BEELZEBUB ["master of the house"], a heathen deity who was thus made a synonym for the prince of evil, a later form of BAAL-ZEBUL ["lord of flies," probably in allusion to the fact that he was regarded as the sun-god]; APOLLYON and ABADDON, two names meaning in Greek and Hebrew respectively "destroyer."

The two great poetic creations by Milton and Goethe of Satan and Mephistopheles have had a great effect upon religious thought, yet hardly more so than the horned and cloven-hoofed figure of popular notion. This latter figure was the prescriptive mode of representing the devil in the mediæval miracle-plays, and in consequence has come to be a part of the vulgar notion and language. "To detect the cloven foot" is a phrase which is so common as almost to lead the unthinking to conclude that there must be Scriptural authority for the idea that the devil is so marked.

Meanwhile it should be seriously considered by those who reject the doctrine of the personality of Satan, that such rejection may and others were published by his son after his death. In addition he wrote a series of Discourses on the historical events of the Old and New Testament, and a pamphlet on L'Etat du Christianisme en France.

Savonarola, GIROLAMO, was born at Ferrara on Sept. 21st, 1452. He seems to have been a quiet, reserved child, but at the same time to have shown signs at an early age of great intellectual powers. His grandfather had been a celebrated physician, and it was decided that Girolamo should follow the same profession. But a distaste for this, combined with a disappointment in love, determined him to devote himself to the retired life of a monastery. He left home secretly in April, 1475, and took monastic vows at the convent of St. Domenico at Bologna. He went to Ferrara in 1485, and preached there several times, but created no stir. He asked at first to be allowed to undertake merely the most humble offices in the monastery, but the superiors very soon recognised his intellectual powers, and employed him to instruct the novices. Suddenly at Bologna he burst out, entrancing all hearts and filling the church with excited crowds, who were spellbound under his magnificent oratory. Thence he was sent to Florence, and it was in this city that he made his name famous in history. Lorenzo de Medici was then at the height of his power and magnificence, and under his influence the whole town was given up to worldly and sensual pleasures. Savonarola set about awakening the citizens to a sense of their danger. He preached his first sermon in Florence in 1483; but, accustomed to the learned, subtle discourses of the Schoolmen, the people at first treated with contempt one who in simple, unpolished words urged them to repent of their sins. Savonarola was not discouraged by this failure. He preached for a year or two in small towns outside the walls of Florence. In 1490 he returned, and in a very few weeks had taken the whole city by storm. He became so powerful, and was supported by so many influential citizens, that Lorenzo became uneasy, and Savonarola was privately urged to be a little less bitter against those in authority; but he refused to listen. In 1491 he was made Prior of the Convent of St. Mark's, but utterly refused to conform to the usage of paying homage to Lorenzo for it. In 1492 the duke was on his death-bed, and although he had been granted absolution by one of the attendant priests, his mind was not at rest. Suddenly he thought of Savonarola, who had never been afraid to speak the truth to him, and caused him to be sent for. Writers differ as to the result of this interview—~~Probian~~, a courtier, asserting that Savonarola granted absolution; Burlamacchi, a friend of Savonarola, asserting equally decidedly that it was denied. As the latter account was written at a time when Savonarola was in very bad favour, and there were plenty of people who would have been only too glad to deny it had it been false, it appears the most probable. During the rule of Lorenzo's successor, Piero, Florence lost some of its prestige; but it still had great power, and Savonarola was without question the most influential man in the city. The moral improvement which he effected in Florence was most remarkable, the whole aspect of the city changed for the better; but his work now began to cause uneasiness at Rome. It is said that Pope Alexander VI. offered him a Cardinal's hat, hoping thereby to silence him. Savonarola declined the offer. The Pope then ordered him to appear in Rome, but he refused to obey. In 1497 he was excommunicated. A powerful hostile party was formed against him in Florence, which at the beginning of 1498 handed him over to the Inquisition, and on May 23rd of the same year he was publicly burned. As an author his fame rests on his Treatise on the 51st Psalm, his Compendium Revelationum, and his Triumpho della Croce.

Savoy Conference, held at the Savoy, London, in 1661, between the Church of England Catholic divines and the Puritans. Their object was to endeavour to settle differences, and so arrange the Prayer Book as to make it acceptable to both parties. The conference consisted of twelve bishops, amongst whom were Sanderson, Pearson, and Sparrow; and twelve Puritan divines, amongst whom were Baxter, Calamy, Reynolds, and Lightfoot. The Presbyterian divines desired the restriction of responses to the "Amen," the abolition of saints' days and of commemoration of the dead; a change with regard to the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, with the introduction of extemporaneous prayers; and the optional use of the ring in matrimony, the sign of the cross in baptism, the surplice, and kneeling at the Holy Communion. After sitting from April 15th to July 24th, they could come to no conclusion, not a single point being yielded to the Puritans or by them, and the Conference finally reported that "The Church's welfare, unity, and peace, and his Majesty's satisfaction, were ends upon which they were all agreed, but as to means they could not come to any harmony." The few alterations made in the Prayer Book immediately afterwards by a committee of bishops, such as the addition to the Lessons of the Story of Bel and the Dragon, made it if anything still more objectionable to the Puritans; and the consequence of the failure of this attempt at compromise, followed as it was by the Act of Uniformity in the following year, was the virtual exclusion of some 2,000 Puritan ministers from the Church, and the loss of many thousands of their adherents.

Sawtre, WILLIAM (the name was originally Chatrys), the first of the Lollard martyrs.

and it is now applied to Deists and to those who doubt the Creeds of the Church or the truth of the Scriptures.

Schoffer, JEAN, German philologist and antiquary (b. at Strassburg of a noble family, 1621; d. at Upsala, March, 1679). He was a good linguist and historian, and in 1643 published De Varietate Nominum apud Veteres. In 1648, anxious to get free from the civil wars raging in Alsace, he went to Sweden, having been encouraged to do so by the good reception given to men of learning at the Court of Queen Christina. He had already become known there by the works he had published, and was appointed by the Queen Professor of Rhetoric at the University of Upsala, where he continued to work with great diligence till his death. He was made King's Law Professor and Librarian of the University, and published several books under the royal direction. The greater number of these were editions of Ælian, Arrian, Phædrus, Justin, and others, and he also wrote Upsalia Antiqua, a History of Lapland, and numerous treatises.

Schelling, FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEF VON [b. 1775, d. 1854], an illustrious German philosopher, born at Leonberg, near Stuttgart, educated at Tübingen and Leipzig, and in 1798 began to lecture at Jena, then the headquarters of German speculative activity. The bent of his mind was determined at this time by his colleague, Fichte, but he gradually found his views unsatisfying, and proceeded to develop his own views of Intuitionism. The only true knowledge is that which identifies the real and ideal, nature and spirit. In Christ, God became for the first time objective, and in His person sacrificed the finite, and thus opened the knowledge of the Divine and eternal world to man. Later Schelling became a Professor at Würzburg, and here his teaching became more distinctly Christian. He declared that Christianity had three phases to pass through—the Petrine, or Catholic; the Pauline, or Protestant, and the Johannean, the philosophical Church of the future—and this teaching has been again and again repeated in modern writers.

Schism [from the Greek schizo, "I cleave, or rend"].—The word is generally held to denote the act of separating from the Church, and so dividing the body which Christ prayed might be one. The Church was originally one, and is so described in the New Testament. [See 1 Cor. i. 9, 10; xii. 13; Eph. iv. 1-6; Rom. xvi. 17, 18.] The Church of Corinth is described as tending towards parties and divisions, and for this St. Paul rebukes it sharply. From time to time some great schism has rent the Church, such as the Novatian and the Donatist, where the seceders separated on questions of discipline; and a quarrel between two rival Popes divided the Western Church for many years. [PAPAL SCHISM.] The Roman Church brings it as a charge against the Reformed Churches that they are in schism; to which these reply that the departure of that Church from Apostolic doctrine is so marked and patent that no choice is left to the lovers of truth but to hold it fast, and to leave the responsibility to the Church which usurps authority at the expense of truth. Except on such grounds all division and separation is held to be a sin, since division, whether necessary or not, is a loss of power, and therefore an evil. Many Nonconformists make virtually the same reply to those in the Anglican Church who bring a similar charge against them, holding as they do that Episcopal methods are a very wide departure from primitive and original Christianity, and that the Church became thus corrupted at a very early age, even in the time of the earlier Fathers. Others, again, take a totally different view of schism itself, insisting that the primitive use of the word describes party spirit or disunion in the body, and that actual separation and formation into a distinct body is not schism, this view was maintained by Dr. Campbell. And others again have maintained that while diverse opinion is likely to lead to separate bodies in practice, there is and can be no schism whilst common Christianity is willingly acknowledged, and common Christian action undertaken on all possible various occasions; but that schism does exist on the part of any who refuse such acknowledgment or common action to others who are willing to give it on their part. There are various modifications of different views concerning this vexed question, but the above are the chief.

Schleiermacher, FRIEDRICH ERNST DANIEL [b. 1768, d. 1834], a great German theologian, was the son of a Lutheran minister at Breslau, and was educated first by his father, then in a Moravian school. Under the influence of the elementary teaching he received he was a pious child and deeply reverential in spirit; but, nevertheless, scepticism took such possession of him that he declares that he doubted the historical truth of any of the ancient Scriptures. But he had no desire to doubt, and he eagerly read the philosophical writings of his countrymen, especially Kant and Spinoza, in the hopes of having his doubts removed, and in his twenty-sixth year was ordained to the ministry. In 1799 he published his Discourses on Religion—a deeply earnest work intended to conciliate unbelievers, and to convince them that faith in an unseen world was compatible not only with reason but with the deepest human instincts. Neander declared that to this work he owed his spiritual life. Meanwhile, Schleiermacher threw himself heartily into politics and social questions, urging Germany, e.g., to resist the insolence of Napoleon.

He was appointed Court Preacher in 1802, and Professor of Theology at the University of Halle in 1804. In 1810 the University of Berlin was founded. Schleiermacher was one of its active promoters, and was the first to occupy the Theological Chair. His translation of Plato (1804-10) placed him among the most famous Greek scholars of his time, and though English scholars regard its criticisms as too subjective, the book holds a very high position. Meanwhile he was indefatigable as a preacher, and his sermons, published in seven volumes, are masterpieces of earnest and penetrating power. He was certainly not what his countrymen would regard as an orthodox divine, for he had declared dogma to be an incrustation on the essential divinity of Christianity, but he was earnest, devout, reverent, of massive understanding and surpassing eloquence. Being seized with a fatal illness he called his friends and disciples together, and solemnly professed his faith in Christ as the Saviour and in the propitiation made by His death. He then himself celebrated and distributed the Holy Communion. His works are many and voluminous, the most important is his Christian Dogmatics, a masterpiece of theology. He regarded Christ as not only perfect and sinless, but as having the fulness of Divinity dwelling within Him, and as dwelling in succession in the hearts of the faithful. His Essay on St. Luke's Gospel, a characteristic specimen of his free historical criticism, was translated and published by the late Bishop Thirlwall, who pronounced it "a specimen of exegetical criticism which has seldom been equalled, and which cannot fail to excite the admiration even of those who do not admit all its conclusions." His conception of divinity was pantheistic, but his heart went deeper than his intellectual conceptions. He was a man of prayer, and a believer even where he found the historical evidence unsatisfying. His speculations are mostly left behind in the progress of thought, but his earnest piety, and the real soundness of his inner theology, his personal faith in God and in Christ, have endeared him to the hearts of his countrymen. They read his sermons, and love them, and reverence his memory. Among his disciples are the great names of Neander, Ullmann, Olshausen, Lucke, and Block.

Schmalkald, LEAGUE OF, for the defence of Protestantism, was formed Feb. 27th, 1531, under the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, and was joined by fourteen German princes and twenty-one imperial cities, comprising nearly all the principal cities of North Germany, and others in the centre and south. The peace of Nurnberg [1532] followed immediately on the formation of the League, and this success was followed up by the raising of a large standing army and the drawing up of the Articles of Schmalkald in 1537. These were drawn up by Luther as a protest against the authority of the Pope, and were signed by all the members of the League. They were principally designed to show how far the Lutherans were disposed to go in order to avoid a final rupture, and in what sense they were willing to adopt the doctrine of Christ's presence in the Eucharist. In a few years' time passions began to arise among the various princes, the strength of the League gave way, and its army was routed at Muhlberg, in April, 1547.

Scholastici. — Ecclesiastics connected with a cathedral or collegiate chapter, on whom the duty devolved of superintending the management of its schools. The scholastici, called also capitulari, capite scholares, and magistri scholarum, appear to have originated in the time of Charlemagne, and often taught personally in the schools, in addition to their work of superintending other teachers. At the Council of Trent it was decreed that the scholasteria should be held only by a doctor, master, or licentiate in theology or canon law, and that otherwise the appointment should not hold good.

Schoolmen. — The famous teachers so called were the revivers in the Western Church of Theology as a science. In the Greek Church it had become a tradition, but in the West the Schoolmen set themselves the task of reducing the traditional dogmas of the Church to a complete system. This principle, to use the words of Hallam, was "an alliance between faith and reason, an endeavour to arrange the orthodox system of the Church, which as authority had made it [all through the existence of this movement we find them turn to the laws of government, etc., had done by the various Church Councils, and not to the Bible], according to the rules of the Aristotelian dialectic." The natural result of the constant study of the works of Aristotle was the foundation of a new school of philosophy, and we find the logical system of the famous Greek philosopher and theology treated side by side in the works of the Schoolmen. At first they contented themselves with long arguments on natural and revealed religion, removing by clever reasoning all that they considered liable to objection, turning the whole thing from a purely metaphysical point of view. They were, at the same time, wonderfully united in their mode of philosophising; but before very long different parties were formed. Each leading man had his own followers, who supported him and his theories and refused to see reason in the argument of any one. These at last settled down into two chief sects, the Realists and the Nominalists. [REALISTS; NOMINALISTS.]

The first period of the Scholastic philosophy reaches from Anselm to Alexander III. [1073-1200]. The principal figure in the period are Abelard (Rationalistic); Anselm and Peter the Lombard (Realistic); St. Bernard and Walter of St. Victor (Mystical; "res divinas non disputatio competendit, sed sanctitas"). Each great theologian dogmatised from his own standpoint on the doctrines of the Trinity, on Sin, the Work of Christ, on the Priesthood and the Sacraments. Thus, while Anselm in his Cur Deus Homo? made the first scientific attempt to construct the doctrine of Redemption on the basis of law, holding that by sin the honour due to God is withheld and punishment is deserved, and that this punishment can only be remitted by satisfaction, Abelard denied any necessary connection between the death of Christ and forgiveness.

Scholasticism was at its best, and exercised the most influence, during the thirteenth century, which may be called the second stage of its existence. The cause may, to a great extent, be traced to the establishment of the Mendicant Friars. A great many men joined this order, and the result was an increased number of students of theological philosophy. The two most famous of all the Schoolmen lived at this time, THOMAS AQUINAS [q.v.] and a Dominican, DUNS SCOTUS [q.v.], a Franciscan, each the founder of a rival sect, named respectively THOMISTS [q.v.] and SCOTISTS [q.v.]. These and the Nominalists—the sect started by ROSCELIN [q.v.] in the twelfth, and revived by WILLIAM OF OCKHAM [q.v.] in the thirteenth—were fierce and bitter rivals for nearly two hundred years, and the books written on all sides advocating their views are innumerable. The leading idea still in their teaching was that of theology treated as a science pure and simple. The decline of this theology began in the fourteenth century, soon after the appearance of Wyclif with his new doctrines. He and his followers tried to teach a more spiritual Christianity, and put the main facts of religion before the people in a more mystical, as opposed to the argumentative way. From this time the Schoolmen steadily declined, but for different reasons their decline was very slow. It might be thought that the new and enlightened ideas started by the revival of learning would have exploded the long and laborious theories of the old Schoolmen in a very short space of time; but habit, and the tenacity with which the chief universities at first adhered to the old lines of thought, made their defeat and extinction very slow. The task of stating fairly the good or bad influence exercised by the Schoolmen is a difficult one. On the one hand, a clear, subtle style of argument was studied and brought to a fair state of perfection; but on the other hand, the minute attention to the smallest detail, the raising of objections for the sake of answering (as it almost appears), make their books frivolous and tedious. Another influence they had, which produced far worse consequences, was that of discouraging by their methods the expansion of the mind. They were content to argue and discuss the rules of philosophy laid down by Aristotle or the old Christian Fathers, but the study of the Scriptures was neglected, and they looked with horror on any one making experiments, or seeking after fresh sources of truth. It was the revival of learning in the fifteenth century which showed to the Church and the world "a more excellent way."

Schultens, ALBERT, a famous Hebrew grammarian and Orientalist [b. at Gröningen, 1686; d. at Leyden, 1750]. He studied at Leyden and Utrecht, made himself master of Greek and Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic, and obtained a post as Professor of Oriental Languages at Franeker. He had previously been made Doctor of Theology and minister of Wassenaer in 1711, but had resigned the latter for his professorship. From 1729 until his death he was at the theological seminary at Leyden. His chief works relate to the study of Hebrew, and he was the first to show that Hebrew is only a branch of the Semitic languages, and consequently could not be the original language given by God to man, as was commonly believed. He also held that the study of Arabic is necessary to a correct understanding of Hebrew. He wrote some books on the Old Testament, and various addresses and criticisms.

Schwartz, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, an eminent missionary [b. at Sonnenburg, in the Electorate of Brandenburg, 1726; d. at Tanjore, 1798]. He studied at Halle, where he attended the lectures of Michaelis on theology, and assisted Schultz in editing the Tamil Bible which the latter had translated. Schwartz was thus induced to become a missionary, and was sent by the Danish Missionary Society in Copenhagen to Tranquebar in 1750. He had previously obtained the patronage of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and was removed by this society to Tanjore in 1779. He was employed by the Government of Madras to undertake an embassy to Hyder Ali, which was successful, and the terms of peace were settled. It did not, however, last long, and between 1781 and 1783, while Tanjore was besieged by Hyder, the sufferings of the inhabitants from famine were terrible; but by the intervention of Schwartz with the cultivators, promising to pay them not only for provisions supplied, but for any bullock stolen by the enemy, food was at length procured and the town saved. In 1785 he founded schools at Tanjore for teaching the natives the English language. He was one of the most successful English missionaries in India, and did much to establish confidence among the natives towards the English. His name is revered not only by Christian converts, but by Mohammedans and Hindoos.

endeavoured to bring about conformity with the Roman standard. The chief points in which she effected a change were, the time of keeping Lent, the observance of Sunday, and the manner of receiving the Communion. She died in 1093, and for a few years there was a reaction against the changes she had made. Her three sons reigned in succession, Edgar, Alexander I., and David. During the reign of Malcolm Canmore and his successors, a circumstance took place which greatly changed the aspect of the Scottish Church—namely, the immigration into the south and east of Scotland of settlers whom the oppression of William the Conqueror had driven out of England. These settlers received grants of land, intermarried with the Scottish nobility, and introduced English customs. Parishes were formed, two new dioceses were created by Alexander I., and, as in England, the Church became more Papal. David, who reigned from 1124 to 1153, did much for the Church of Rome in Scotland. In his time the Augustinian and Cistercian Orders were introduced, and fifteen religious houses were founded, among them, Melrose, Holyrood, and Dryburgh. He created bishoprics at Glasgow, Brechin, Dunkeld, Dumblane, Ross, Caithness, and Aberdeen. Lismore or Argyll, created in 1222, was the only one formed after his death. From 1153 to the beginning of the fifteenth century the Church of Rome remained in possession of Scotland. The Scottish Church differed from the English in having no archbishop, though the kings of Scotland had from time to time pressed the Pope to make St. Andrews an archbishopric. The latter preferred to keep the superintendence of the Church in his own hands, and sent a papal legate as his representative to attend the Diocesan Councils, much to the dislike of the Scottish bishops. In 1225 Pope Honorius III. authorised the holding of these Councils without the Legate, and in 1472 St. Andrews (held at that time by Bishop Patrick Graham) was at length erected into an archbishopric; but this having been done without the knowledge of the King or the other bishops, the new Archbishop passed the rest of his life as a prisoner in Lochleven. His successor, Schevez, was made Primate in 1487, and in 1492 the Bishop of Glasgow was also promoted to be an Archbishop, whereupon a strife began between the two dignitaries, and never ceased till the Reformation. In course of time most of the wealth of Scotland came into the possession of the Church, and for this reason the monasteries relaxed in discipline and lost the esteem of the people. The Mendicant Orders were instituted to remedy this evil, and soon became popular; but their popularity only tended in time to produce the same effect as with the monasteries, for they became proud and overbearing towards the other clergy, disunited and quarrelsome among themselves, and finally objects of scorn and ridicule on account of the immorality of their lives. The spark of religion which the rise of the Mendicants had kindled, declined with them, and from that time the Church of Scotland sank lower than ever. Bishops and clergy were appointed not on account of their piety or learning, but to gain some private ends of the Sovereign, in many cases for the sake of the wealth which rich clergy brought to the Crown in exchange. The state of the Church grew worse as time went on; preaching was almost entirely discontinued except by the friars; and the only bright spots in this dark period were the lives of a few good men who, from time to time, did their utmost to stir up the minds of the people to a sense of their danger. No permanent effect was felt till the beginning of the fifteenth century, when some of Wycliffe's disciples made their way across the border, and began preaching in the south of Scotland, some of them travelling as far north as Perth. They denounced boldly the corrupt customs which prevailed in the Scottish Church, the Roman errors which had crept in at the same time that all the life of religion seemed to have died out. They aimed at reforming the lives and conduct of the clergy; and in spite of the hatred which was everywhere felt towards them, they succeeded in at least preparing the minds of the people for the Reformation which was to follow.

3. The Reformation.—It is not certain whether PATRICK HAMILTON [q.v.], who came to Scotland in 1523 from Paris, was the first to preach the doctrines of the Reformers in Scotland. He was certainly one to whom Scotland owes much for his courage in preaching the Reformed religion. After the death of Archbishop Beaton, who had condemned Hamilton, the persecution of the Reformers was entrusted to his nephew, David Beaton, Abbot of Arbroath, who had been educated in France, and was a staunch Roman Catholic. He extended his imitation of French customs even to the manner of dealing with heretics, and induced the King to take part with him in stamping out the Reformed religion. For some years a continual inquisition went on; numbers were tortured and put to death, and many more were imprisoned or forfeited their possessions.

The name of GEORGE WISHART [q.v.] stands out, in the early part of the sixteenth century, as one of the most learned Reformers that Scotland had yet seen; he was seized and burnt to death in 1545. His place was filled immediately by one who had hitherto been simply one of his disciples, but who was destined to become far more famous than his master — JOHN KNOX [q.v.]. During the Regency of Mary of Guise for her daughter, a constant struggle was going on between the two religions, and led eventually to a civil war, which ended in a victory for the Protestants in 1560, just after the Regent's death. The l, and took the opportunity of planning reforms in Church matters. He made some changes in the revenues; formed Perth into a bishopric, with the Collegiate Church of St. Giles as its cathedral; for more important matter, he ordered the introduction of a Liturgy, to be modelled on that of the English Church. This Service Book was the work of Archbishop Laud; completed in 1637, and on July 23rd it was used for the first time at St. Giles's;

Dean was not allowed to proceed before the first few words before an uproar was raised which obliged him and the Bishop of Perth, who was present with the Archbishop of St. Andrews, to escape for their lives.

The innovation resulted in the raising of a National Covenant, signed in Greyfriars Churchyard at Edinburgh, in 1638, the members of which bound themselves to defend their Church from the incursions of Popery. In November, the General Assembly met; the Five Articles, the Forty-two Canons, and the new Prayer Book were rejected, the bishops were tried and deposed from their bishoprics, and Presbyterianism was once more restored in its original form. Proceeding on the part of the Assembly was not but have serious consequences; a Bill was presented to the King, but he refused to take any notice of it, and the Scotch King was speedily prepared for war. Peace was made before actual hostilities had begun, but the King began to realise how much in the wrong his opponents were. He undertook to call a General Assembly to settle the disputes, and it met the following year: its business consisted in doing again what had been done by its predecessor, and the Assemblies which had established Episcopacy were declared to have been illegal.

It was soon known that Charles was again in Scotland; his army ready for an invasion, and the Scotch resolved to be beforehand with him. In August, 1640, an army, headed by James Graham of Montrose, marched southward to the possession of Newcastle. Frightened by this decisive measure, the King hastened to make concessions, and gave up all the points on which he had before insisted most strongly.

Solemn League and Covenant.—With the outbreak of a rebellion came new hopes to the Presbyterians, who trusted that Presbytery would now extend over the whole kingdom, and in anticipation of such an event they determined to bind themselves, with their English brethren, by a religious covenant, to protect the rights of their Church. The Solemn League and Covenant was drawn up towards the close of 1643, and sanctioned by the General Assembly, and the oaths were taken by the members of the Parliament. [COVENANT; CAMERON.]

In 1645 the Directory for the Public Worship of God was accepted by the Assembly, and in 1647 they also accepted the Westminster Confession of Faith, taking exception only to one or two points. On the execution of Charles I., the Scots proclaimed Charles II. king, and induced him to sign the Covenant, for they were resolute in refusing to acknowledge Oliver Cromwell. On the Restoration, King Charles, who hated the Covenant, dismissed the Assembly, and took the government of the Church under his own control. He again introduced Episcopacy, and now began a terrible time of persecution to the Covenanters. The leader in this raid against Presbyterianism was Archbishop Sharp. [SHARP, JAMES.] In 1670 was passed the Conventicle Act, forbidding the meetings of the Covenanters and enforcing compulsory attendance at church, and the next few years exhibit fierce persecution, and a constant struggle between the two parties.

7. Presbyterian Church established by Act of Parliament.—The fall of James II. in 1688 brought down the Episcopal Church also. Scotland had for many years been becoming more Puritanical in its tendencies, and was now most rigorous in the stress laid upon the duty of prayer and fasting, and the sins of frivolity and dissipation. Episcopacy was at an end in many parts of the country, though it was not definitely abolished till 1689, when the Convention of the Estates met and denounced it, and in 1690 an Act of the Parliament of William and Mary confirmed the Presbyterian Confession of Faith, and ordered the use of the Catechism and Directory for Public Worship. The patronage of the Church was conferred on the Elders and Town Councils in the boroughs, and on the landowners in the country.

The General Assembly, which met in 1690, appointed two commissions to visit the clergy in different parts of the country to enforce discipline. In the north the arrangement was a failure, for the commissioners were incapable of acting with the moderation which the Assembly wished, and numbers of the clergy were turned out of their livings, while the people refused to allow the Presbytery to appoint successors. In many places Episcopalians were put in the vacant livings by the parishioners, and in these parishes the Presbyteries lost all control, if indeed they were not left destitute of members. King William became dissatisfied as the confusion increased, delayed the meeting of the Assembly, and finally refused to admit any member who would not take the "Oath of Assurance" that he was King de facto and de jure. Lord Carstairs, the King's confidential adviser, prevailed upon him to countermand the order, and his consent restored in a great measure the confidence of the Scottish clergy, who had begun to regard him with distrust. Liberty was granted to the Episcopalians to remain in possession of their benefices, though they were the right of the people to a share in Church government, and the Veto Act was passed in 1834, to enable the laity to reject the nomination of any minister appointed by the patron, provided that the veto was agreed to by the majority of the congregation. The ministers were forced into accepting the decree against their will, and later many of them had to give way to another change—namely, the admission of the ministers of unendowed chapels into the General Assembly. An opening once made, fresh innovations followed, and in 1839 members of the Associate Synod of Seceders were admitted. Many ministers appealed against vetos brought against them, and trials to decide on the judgment of the Presbyteries were brought before the Assembly. The Court of Session hastened to attempt to repair the evils by impolitic measures, till the confusion reached its height, and the Non-Intrusion party called loudly for separation from the Scottish Church. The separation came in 1843, and caused much surprise to many who did not understand the spirit of the Scottish people, and believed that only a few of the most violent Non-Intrusionists would go so far as to cut themselves off from communion with the Church. In the midst of the general confusion which prevailed about 1842, the Moderates were unfortunate in having no one capable of taking the lead, or deciding on what course it would be well to adopt, while on the other side were Chalmers and Dr. Candlish, who was in reality the leader of the party. In November, 1842, the General Assembly met, and after ten days' discussion they bound themselves to stand by one another, and to unite themselves into a separate body. The FREE CHURCH was formed on May 18th, 1843, when of the 1,200 ministers who had hitherto belonged to the Established Church, 451 seceded. After the first shock which the parent Church felt from the Secession, its work went on with no less earnestness and success than before; and it proceeded to redress one by one the grievances which had been the cause of its troubles. The work of the Maintainers was hard, for the Seceders put in their way all the difficulties they could devise, and public feeling was all against them. But the Church overcame the opposition, and the work of Church extension prospered, mainly under the guidance of Professor James Robertson, who set on foot the endowment scheme, for the carrying on of the Church's work in the chapels already built. Mission work also made great advances in the years which followed the Secession, and in this also Dr. Robertson and Dr. Norman Macleod were the moving spirits. The grievance of patronage was again considered, and the Scotch Benefices Act was brought in; but, though hailed with delight by the people, it was rejected by the Parliament, as giving too much power to the Church. Many efforts were made to bring the question fairly before the Assembly, and finally in 1868 a Committee of Inquiry was instituted, whose report to the Assembly resulted in a victory to the supporters of Anti-Patronage. The Established Church of Scotland has 1,283 parishes, and 1,479 ministers.

Scotland, EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF.—As our previous article will have partly shown, the National Church of Scotland had been made, at least nominally, Episcopalian upon the accession of James I. to the throne of England, Presbyterianism regaining the ascendancy on the accession of Charles I., and Episcopacy being once more restored at the Restoration of Charles II. Thus it remained until the accession of William III. in 1688. Presbyterianism was then finally established, not so much as the Church of the majority, as because the Episcopal Bishops refused to take the oath—were, in other words, Nonjurors. No doubt the same course would have been taken in England if the Church had not yielded to circumstances, and taken the oath of allegiance. The Rebellion of '45 was disastrous to the Episcopal Church in Scotland. The Bishops were, almost without exception, Jacobites, and the Government treated them most rigorously as political offenders and rebels. In 1746 an Act was passed forbidding the Episcopalian form of worship, except in the presence of the clergyman's family, and that only twice a year. The punishment for the first offence was imprisonment for six months; for the second, transportation for life. The grandfather of the late Bishop of Aberdeen, the author of "Tullochgorum," which Burns pronounced the noblest of all Scotch songs, was imprisoned for six months in 1753, for the crime of reading the Liturgy to more than four persons beyond his own family. Many clergy did duty no less than sixteen times on a Sunday in order to keep within the law. The Episcopal Church was reduced to the last extremity, but a few faithful men were left, who worked hard to prevent her entire extinction. It was not until 1792 that these penal laws were rescinded. Meanwhile a serious difficulty had been created among the Episcopalians, which even yet has hardly died out. There were some who preferred the Liturgy to the Presbyterian services, but had no taste for civil disabilities, and these professed Episcopalian views, but without placing themselves under the Scottish bishops. These places of worship were designated "qualified chapels." Hence there was introduced a cause of variance at once. After the penal laws were abolished it was hoped that reunion between these might have been effected, and in 1804 a Convocation of the Scotch Episcopal Clergy met at Laurencekirk, and subscribed to the English Articles and Liturgy as a basis. But a cause of difference remained. The Scottish Episcopal Church had adopted, with the English Nonjurors, a

ied during the early centuries of the an Era to mark this period as deficient istian works of art of any description.
o centuries before the birth of Christ
l been in a state of decline, and when , the mistress of art, came under the yoke, there seemed little prospect genuine revival. But sculpture had r disadvantage, namely, the association ges in the mind of the Jews with the y forbidden by the Mosaic Law; and rly Christians regarded images with y less abhorrence. Roman art had rated into the representation of the passions of human nature, and the an avoided it for this reason, Ter-going so far as to say that art invention of the devil. The earliest ons from this strict avoidance of image p are the monumental representations ature of Biblical history; and these are rudest and most elementary description.
s representing objects of worship were re until about the tenth century, though s that some Christians were found who ed them, and even protested against the tion of beautiful Pagan images. Sepulchral reliefs gradually found their way more and more into use to adorn monuments, shrines, Church furniture, etc., and crucifixes began to be used, not as objects of worship, but simply as beautiful works of art. In the West, sculpture formed a part of architecture, and instead of setting up solitary statues inside churches, it became customary to adorn the west fronts of the larger churches with images of Christ and the Virgin, angels, saints, and martyrs, and with representations of scenes from the life of Christ. All these figures, without exception, were required to be clothed in long draperies, and this necessarily hampered the artists, who had none of them as yet attained to the highest skill, while it sometimes destroyed the distinctness of a scene in which many figures were grouped together. The first Christian sculptor who can be named as having reached any great degree of excellence was Nicolo Pisano, an Italian of the thirteenth century, who executed a series of bas-reliefs at Pisa and Siena, representing events in the life of Christ and the Last Judgment. His pupils carried on the work, and the west front of the cathedral of Orvieto, the door of its baptistery and other works, show traces of his influence. In the fifteenth century sculpture progressed under Donatello, Brunelleschi, and especially Ghiberti; and these prepared the way for the greatest of all Christian sculptors, Michael Angelo Buonarroti [1475-1564]. His chef d'œuvre was the figure of Moses, in the Church of San Pietro in Vincoli, at Rome, and his works enrich most of the principal buildings at Rome and Florence.

Sculptetus, ABRAHAM, Divinity Professor at Heidelberg, was born at Grünberg, in Silesia, in 1566; died at Emden in 1624. He studied at Görlitz, Wittenberg, and Heidelberg, was ordained in 1589, and became the pastor of a little village in the Palatinate, afterwards Court Preacher to the Elector Palatine Friedrich V., and in 1598 Pastor of St. Francis' Church at Heidelberg. In 1612 he accompanied the Elector to England, where he became acquainted with many learned men. On his return to Heidelberg in 1618 he was made Divinity Professor.
Soon after he was sent as a Commissioner to the Synod of Dort, where he first acted the part of mediator, but finding this was hopeless, became a vigorous champion for the contra-remonstrants. He was accused in 1620 of advising the Elector Palatine to accept the crown of Bohemia, and of raising great disturbances in the Palatinate about the explication of the Sacrament. He lost his professorship at Heidelberg; but two years after became preacher at Emden. He wrote Ethicorum libri duo, Sphæricorum libri tres, and Medulla theologiæ patrum.

Episcopal Church of America [b. at Groton, graphy. [ERSKINE, EBENEZER.] In 1747 secession took place on the question of the oath, which had been introduced of Parliament into Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c., which ran as follows: "Here I am before God and your lordships, that I will not dissent from, nor allow with my heart the true religion presently professed within this realm, as authorised by the laws thereof: I shall defend the same to my power, and defend the same to my power, renouncing the Roman religion and Papistry." Some affirmed that no seceder could take this oath, as it implied an adherence to the Established Church with all its corruptions; while others took it as merely making a profession of Protestantism in opposition to Popery, in no way involving a compromise of principle. Those who condemned it were popularly called Anti-Burghers; those who tolerated it, Burghers. The latter adopted the name of Associate Synod; the former, adopting the name General Associate.

In 1752 came yet another division, on the deposition of Thomas Gillespie, minister of Inverkeithing, for refusing to instal Andrew Wilson in the parish of Inverkeithing, a pointment being very unpopular with the parishioners. In 1761 he, with two others, formed what is called the RELIEF CHURCH, or PRESBYTERY, taking the name of "Relief" from its purpose of furnishing relief to churches suffering from the evils of schism.

In 1820 the Burghers and Anti-Burghers united as the United Secession, and in 1847 the Secession and Relief Churches united as the UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH [q.v.].

Original Seceders and the Cameronians united the FREE CHURCH.

ker, Thomas, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, was born of Dissenting parents at Horpe, in Nottinghamshire, in 1693. He was educated at the Chesterfield Grammar School, and at the Dissenting academy at Attercliffe, and finally at Tewkesbury, where he became acquainted with Samuel Chandler and Joseph Sturges, afterwards the famous Bishop of Exeter. He was intended for a Dissenting minister, but he gave up the idea, and began to study medicine. Some of his friends—as the son of the Bishop of Durham—were of opinion that he should follow the example of his father and join the Established Church. This was at length prevailed upon to do; and he was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and was ordained in 1723.

He advanced rapidly in the Church, being appointed Chaplain to Bishop Talbot [1723], Rector of Houghton-le-Spring, which he soon resigned for Ryton, Chaplain to the King, and Rector of St. James's, Piccadilly.

He was Bishop of Bristol [1735], of Oxford [1740], and Dean of St. Paul's [1750], and finally Archbishop of Canterbury in 1758. He was a famous preacher and a conscientious, liberal, and pious man. He died Aug. 3rd, 1768, and was buried in Lambeth churchyard. His Life was written and his works were edited by his chaplain, Beilby Porteus.

Secreta, or, as they are sometimes called, secreta oratio, are the prayers said inaudibly by the priest in the service of the Mass. The lawfulness of the practice was questioned at the Reformation and abolished by the Protestants, but they are still in use in the Roman Church. The argument in favour of their being retained is a canon drawn up by the Council of Trent; but as there is some doubt on the subject, the priests are told they may think as they like about the historical question, but must obey the law.

Sect [Lat. seco, "to cut"].—A collective term, originally comprehending all such as follow the doctrines and opinions of some divine and philosopher; i.e., amongst the Jews we have the sect of the Pharisees and that of the Sadducees, and the early history of the Christian Church tells of many sects, which have all been noticed under their different heads. The term is often used now to characterise those who form separate communions, and do not associate practically with others in religious worship, as Romanists, Lutherans, Methodists, etc.; but would not be rightly applied to the divisions of High and Low Church, because they are only parties in the Church, with great and important differences in opinion indeed, but having made no external breach in the Church, nor separated from each other's communion. [See SCHISM.]

Secular Clergy [Lat. sæculum, "the world," "an age"].—Clergy who lived comparatively in the world, in contradistinction to those confined in a monastery, and bound by vows and rules of life. The term "secular," which had formerly been used to denote all things outside the pale of the Church, came into use as applied to the clergy in the above sense at the beginning of the twelfth century, when Honorius II. allowed the monks of Cluny to receive into their order any secular priests who wished to join them.

Secularism.—A modern form of atheism, the fundamental principle of which is that men should concern themselves solely with the duties and affairs of the present life. The National Secular Society says that "Secularism relates to the present existence of man, and to actions the issue of which can be tested by experience. It declares that the promotion of human improvement and happiness is the highest duty, and that morality is to be tested by utility; that in order to promote effectually the improvement and happiness of mankind, every individual of the human family ought to be well placed and well instructed,

Semi-Arians.—Those who, whilst cate- ly denying the Arian doctrines, held ecrtly in a somewhat modified form. refused to accept the word "consub- l," but said that the Son was of like ue with the Father, thereby in reality g the Divinity of Christ, for there but One God. The Councils of Rimini leucia were composed for the most Semi-Arians. In modern times the s used to denote those who believe ic Son was not from the beginning, s begotten by the will of the Father. loctrines were held by some of the ist divines of the last century, such S. Clarke and Hoadley.

Seminaries.—Schools or colleges ap- for the education of young persons l for the priesthood. There are a great f these in Roman Catholic countries, the first of which is said to have been founded by St. Augustine. In the sixteenth century many of the universities had fallen into the hands of the Protestants, and at the Council of Trent it was decreed that "the metropolitan of every province and the bishop of every diocese, should establish at some suitable place (if there were no institution of the kind already) a college or seminary, in which a certain number of boys exceeding twelve years shall be brought up and in- structed in common, to qualify them for the ecclesiastical estate." For the maintenance of these seminaries certain benefices were al- lotted, or the clergy were obliged to maintain them. The most famous of these was the seminary of St. Sulpicius, founded at Paris by M. Olier about 1650. Almost all the semi- naries were destroyed at the Revolution, but many have since been restored. There are also Evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, where youths are trained till they are ready for the University at Tub- ingen. In 1817, Frederick William III. of Prussia founded a seminary at Wittenberg, in honour of Luther.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Roman Catholics formed the project of founding English seminaries abroad, that from thence they might be furnished with missionaries to perpetuate and increase their communion. Ac- cordingly, the College of Douay was founded in 1569, that of Rome in 1579, Valladolid in 1589, Seville in 1593, and St. Omer in Artois in 1596. In the next century more seminaries were established at Madrid, Lou- vain, Liège, and Ghent.

By a statute of Queen Elizabeth it was made a præmunire to contribute towards the maintenance of a Popish seminary, and by one of James I. no persons are to be sent for instruction to Popish seminaries under divers pains and penalties. At present there are seminaries in England, at Westminster, Birm- ingham, and Liverpool; one in Scotland, at Glasgow; and eight in Ireland, as well as that at Maynooth.

In the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States there are nine theological seminaries.

Semler, JOHANN SALOMO, the founder of historical criticism of the Bible, was born at Saalfeld, in 1725. He was, in 1743, sent to the University of Halle, where he made the acquaintance of Baumgarten, who exercised a great influence over him. He took his degree in 1750, and in 1751 became Historical Pro- fessor at Altdorf, and Theological Professor at Halle. On Baumgarten's death in 1757 Semler succeeded him.

The new departure taken by Semler was this:—The Lutheran teaching had not as- sailed the Bible as the means of God's reve- lation to man, but had denied the authority of the Church. It became necessary to find a

ences.—The texts from Holy Scripture or more of which are read at the beginning of Morning and Evening Prayer, were placed there by the compilers of the Prayer Book of 1552, who followed the example of some of the old Latin breviaries. They dwelt upon the duty of confessors, thus forming a fit introduction to the service which follows immediately. They are partly taken from the Psalms, partly from the Prophetical Books, and three are extracts from the New Testament.

Separatists.—This term has been used in many ways, and in many countries at different periods of ecclesiastical history. It is taken to mean all those who dissent, separate themselves, from the national church of their country. In Mary's reign it was applied to those who refused to attend church, and in Elizabeth's to all who did not conform to the Reformed doctrines. In Germany we find the term in frequent use, especially during the last century, when a sect came into existence at Würtemberg, who for the most part held the same views as the Separatists [q.v.]. They were much persecuted, and at last, in 1803, emigrated to America, where they became known under the name of the Harmony Society. Frederick William III. of Prussia tried to effect a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, and those who refused to join were called Separatists [see also KORNBERG].

In Ireland at the present day there are two sects known as Separatists. The first, of which John Walker, belonged to the Sandemanians [q.v.], and his followers still hold the same doctrines; but he pronounced that it was his intention to discontinue communion with no other sect, and hence the name Separatist. As a distinguishing name they are sometimes called Separatists. Another sect, also agreeing in essential points with the Sandemanians, founded by a Mr. Kelly, formerly a clergyman of the Established Church of Ireland, is called the Plymouth Brethren, which adhere to Mr. Darby [see PLYMOUTH BRETHREN], and which are rather numerous in Ireland, are often also there called Separatists, the word more often used than being Exclusives.

Septuagesima. [QUINQUAGESIMA.]

and by the early Christians. The story of the Septuagint, as given by Aristeas, is as follows:—Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of Lagus, King of Egypt, wished to add a copy of the books of the Jewish Law to his library at Alexandria, and sent to the high priest, Eleazar, to ask for a copy, and for competent persons to translate it into Greek. Seventy-two men, six from each tribe, were sent to Egypt, and after seventy-two days spent in translation, the five books of the Pentateuch were completed, the translators having assisted each other. Later accounts introduce miraculous elements into the story, and Justin Martyr tells that each man was shut up alone in a cell to translate the Old Testament unaided, and that when the results were compared they were found to agree in every point. This was one of the stories current at the time of Justin Martyr, but it is of course mere fable. [BIBLE.]

Sepulchre, THE HOLY, at Jerusalem, the alleged place of our Lord's burial. According to the traditional account, the Romans, who possessed Palestine, upon the destruction of the Holy City declared themselves professed enemies of the glory of Jesus Christ in that place, and in order to eclipse, and if possible extinguish it, they filled the sepulchre with earth, and built an idolatrous temple on the spot: they erected the statue of Jupiter on the place of our Lord's resurrection, and that of Venus where He was crucified. All this was done by the order of Hadrian in 137, when, leaving the old city buried in its own ruins, he built a new one north of Jerusalem, and called it Ælia, and Mount Calvary thus profaned was enclosed in the walls of the new city. The same tradition goes on to state that Constantine the Great, having defeated Licinius, and established the peace of the Church and provided for the security of its faith by the Council of Nice, turned his thoughts to the places consecrated by the life and death of Jesus Christ, which he resolved to rescue from the profanation to which they had long been exposed. The Holy Sepulchre was his first care, and he directed that a magnificent church should be built there in honour of our Lord's resurrection. Eusebius tells us that the Emperor's mother undertook to execute this commission, and in 335 the stately edifice was consecrated by a number of bishops, who came thither from the Council of Tyre. [HELENA, ST. ; CROSS.] From that time the veneration of the Holy Sepulchre daily increased, and the church maintained its grandeur till the beginning of the seventh century, when the Persians, coming into Palestine, demolished part of the building, carried off the cross, and made Zachary, Patriarch of Jerusalem, their prisoner. His successor, Modestus, is said to have recovered the cross and to have restored the church in 635, with African Churches no presbyter was suffered to preach before his bishop until the time of St. Augustine. In the Eastern Church this was not so, though after a presbyter had finished, the bishop used to preach. It would seem that the deacons for many years were not allowed to preach. When this rule was relaxed, the right to preach was also conceded to laymen, but under careful restrictions. They acted as catechists (as in the catechetical school at Alexandria), but not in the churches. Even monks, who were often laymen, were not allowed to preach in church as a rule. But in some cases a special lecture was given, as in the case of Origen, who was licensed by the bishop to preach and expound the Scriptures before he took orders. It was usual when more than one bishop was present in a church for all in turn to take up the word of exhortation. Frequency of sermons depended on the place and the season. Thus Chrysostom's Lenten Sermons were delivered on successive days, and Augustine makes reference to previous sermons as delivered "yesterday." But probably this was only in the case of large parishes and towns. The English Liturgy only actually prescribes one sermon each Sunday, directing in the rubric that it shall follow the Nicene Creed in the Communion Service. But almost universal custom gives a sermon also at the evening service, where it is generally placed at the end, though in some cathedrals and other churches it is put after the third collect. The Act of Uniformity Amendment Act provides that a sermon may also be preached in church without other service.

Sermons have been classed thus: [1] expositions of Scripture; [2] panegyrics on saints; [3] sermons for special seasons; [4] sermons on special duties. It is impossible to lay down fixed rules concerning the structure of a sermon, but we may say that generally it should begin with an exordium, in which the preacher should state his subject in broad outline, avoiding such minuteness as belongs to the separate divisions, seeing that this tends to take off the attention from what follows. Then come the divisions, the more distinct the better, and they should not be too many; and then the application, addressed both to the judgment and to the affections. The minister here should reason, expostulate, warn, exhort, win.

The order of the seasons is useful to the preacher as furnishing him with a variation of topics, and ensuring, if he be painstaking, that he shall have each doctrine of the Gospel in succession before his eyes. "I make a rule," says one well-known preacher, "to take one of my sermons every Sunday from some passage which has occurred in the Services, and the other from something which has not so occurred, and so I force myself to search the Scriptures for new material, and so avoid beaten tracks."

preachers, Dr. Phillips Brooks, in his admirable Lectures on Preaching, lays down the principle that there are two elements to be considered in a sermon, and he calls them Truth and Personality. Preaching is the communication of Truth to man. Nothing can make up for the lack of it. It is truth that binds one preacher to another, and causes the message which they deliver to be received. But the truth is delivered from man to men. It is not written in the sky, it is not merely written in the Bible, it is to be conveyed from man to his fellows, and to be recommended by the vivid personality of the speaker, who delivers what he has received and has felt to be true. Consequently the preacher should know what his preparation ought to be. Not the mere acquisition of knowledge but "the kneading and tempering of a man's whole nature till it becomes of such a consistency and quality as to be capable of transmission. . . . Other works which the sermon writer will find very useful are Claude's Essay on the Composition of a Sermon, Mr. Spurgeon's Lectures on Preaching, delivered to his students, and Mr. D. Moore's Thoughts on Preaching.

Serpentinians. [OPHITES.]

Servetus, MICHAEL, was born in 1509 at Villanueva in Arragon. His parents held a good position there, his father being a notary of some standing. Like his great contemporary Calvin, Servetus passed his young days in a Dominican convent, and like him, too, his first patron was an ecclesiastic, Quintana by name. This priest was father confessor of the Emperor Charles V., and Servetus went with him into Italy, and was much impressed there by the adoration given by the people to the Pope. Even at that time Servetus evidently held the novel opinions of the times, for he compared the Pope to a harlot. The natural ability and great versatility of intellectual powers with which Servetus was endowed, ought to have secured him a brilliant career, if not as a Reformer yet as a man of letters. At Paris in 1534 he gave and received lessons in medicine, mathematics, and astronomy. He conjectured and almost described the circulation of the blood. Large audiences were attracted to hear him, but owing to his exacting, arrogant character, he was soon embroiled with the whole University of Paris, which distrusted his views. Servetus openly characterised all who differed in opinion with himself as "fools and public pests." When he met at Basle such Reformers as Zwingli, Ecolampadius and Bucer, Servetus was written of by Ecolampadius as "That rash, hot-headed Spaniard." Later on Zwingli warned his friend, Ecolampadius, that "the views of the Spaniard will be the ruin of the whole Christian religion." It is remarkable what a different impression Calvin made on these same men. They saw danger to the Reformed religion in one, hope ersy, and Calvin himself took part in. Servetus incautiously admitted his pantheistic doctrines, which shocked and embarrassed the council, amongst whom were the able Libertine leaders—Ami Perrin and Pierre—who were desirous to protect him. But his vanity, frivolity, and unreasonableness led him to disclaim any connection whatever with the Libertines of Geneva, and their confidence was shaken in him. A majority of the Genevese magistrates refused to modify the character of the trial, and had brought to light so much personal animosity, and they therefore granted Servetus's request that the Churches of Berne, Schaffhausen, and Basle should be consulted on his case. They also adjourned several times, thus deferring the decision. On Sept. 22nd, Servetus, after being urged by Calvin in the strongest terms, published so far as to demand that his adversary should be committed for trial, which could only end by the condemnation to death of the two. This attack on Calvin was not even noticed; and, deserted by the magistrates, who now saw the final crisis was at hand, Servetus sank down into dejection and despair, and he at last appealed in the only way that relief might be sent to him—to prison, where he was lying ill and dying.

Necessary comforts were supplied, but the "important things" which he needed he had to communicate were refused as a pretext to gain a hearing, and so he lost all influence over the minds of those who were sent to him. In October the four churches sent in their answers, which were all in favour of condemning Servetus, recommending severity, yet the advice was couched in the most cautious terms. On Oct. 26th, after several adjournments of the trial, the majority of the council decreed that, considering the great errors and blasphemies of Servetus, he should be led to Champel and there burnt alive, and that his books should be burnt with him. Calvin made every effort to change the manner of Servetus's death, although he openly admitted that hanging at the stake was what he considered the punishment he should be. Servetus implored mercy, and Calvin went to him, urging him to recant, which might lead to a mitigation of the sentence. He arranged a meeting between Calvin and Servetus, which, however, was of no avail for Calvin's stern exhortation to recant only wounded Servetus, who kept on asking Calvin's forgiveness at the end of every sitting of the interview. Even in the face of his despair Servetus refused to give up his convictions, and he died even heroically at the stake, attended by Farel, on Oct. 27th, 1553.

Serving Tables.—This was a term used in the administration of the Holy Communion in the Church of Scotland. This Sacrament formerly was often only administered twice in the year, and during the preceding week frequent preparatory services were held. The communion Sunday services were commenced by what was called the action sermon, and this was followed by a prayer and the singing of a psalm; then the minister proceeded to fence the table—that is, to give a brief address warning the ignorant and profane from coming to the holy table, and at the same time setting forth the characteristics of worthy communicants. This introductory address was followed by the singing of an appropriate psalm, such as the cxxxii., during which the elders brought in the elements, and intending communicants took their places round the communion table, which was arranged so as to preserve the idea of a supper. Then the minister descended from the pulpit, and read from 1 Cor. xi. the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and then offered a prayer, popularly called the "consecration prayer." This was followed by an appropriate address to those occupying the table, and was called "serving the table." Then, while repeating the words of institution, the minister gave the elements with his own hands to those who were seated on each side of him, and the elders distributed to the rest of the communicants. During a solemn silence each communicant passed to his neighbour to receive the bread and wine after partaking of them, then the minister added a few words of advice, and dismissed them from the table with a blessing. The table was then again filled, and was addressed by one of the assisting ministers, the minister of the parish taking his seat as a communicant. The service was closed by a psalm of thanksgiving, and a final address to all the communicants. Communion is now generally more frequent, and the practice somewhat modified.

Servites, or "Servants of the Virgin Mary," an Order founded on the festival of the Assumption [1233], at Florence, by seven merchants, one of whom was the uncle of Juliana Falconieri, the foundress of the female Servites in 1306. They previously joined a confraternity to sing the praises of the Virgin, and now withdrew to the Villa Camartia, in a secluded spot outside the city, and devoted themselves entirely to her worship. In 1236 they removed to the Monte Senario, and built a convent, and in 1239 adopted the Augustinian rule, adding several particular constitutions. Their habit was black with a leathern girdle, a scapulary and a cope. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. and Alexander IV., and in 1487, under Innocent VIII., they gained equal privileges with the other four Mendicant Orders. The Order spread very rapidly, and at the death of the last of its founders, Alexis Falconieri, it numbered over 10,000 monks. It did not appear in England before the Reformation, but at present there is a community in the Fulham Road, London, s name so universally famous—that of improving the condition of the poor. His first port in this direction was the passing of the Factory Act, which he effected after much trouble and opposition on the part of the Lords. But the chief of all his good works, and the one with which his name was most early associated, was the institution of the Ragged Schools. He was led to this work by observing the state of utter ignorance that existed amongst the lower classes. He persevered in his efforts, and brought several bills before the Lower House; but in the death of his father, he succeeded to the peerage, and was able to draw the attention of the House of Lords to some of his plans. He went on working to the end of his life, and saw many of his plans accomplished some time before his death, and was able to spend the last years of his life in comparative retirement. His sympathies were entirely with the “Evangelical” party in the Church, and he was President of the Protestant Alliance, the Bible Society, the Moral Aid Society, and the Society for the Conversion of the Jews. He took a warm interest in the employment of youths as shoemakers.

In 1884 he was presented with the Freedom of the City of London, and in May of the following year received an address from the members of the Ragged Schools as a token of gratitude. It was proposed that he should be interred in Westminster Abbey, but he expressed the wish before he died to be buried near his wife at his native home in Wiltshire.

Shakers.—By having some similarity to the Quakers the Shakers are supposed to be a branch of that sect. Their founder was Anne Lee, who left England on account of religious persecution, and went to New York in 1774, where she soon attracted a good following. She derived her importance from her receiving a divine revelation in 1770 testifying against the carnal nature of the flesh as the root of depravity. She was called the “Elect One” or “Mother Anne,” and her followers believed that she was the mother of all the true Christians, and that no blessing could descend to any person but by and through her. She died in 1784, but the society still continued to exist. The “Shakers” was given to them on account of the extraordinary contortions into which they threw their bodies all through the performance of their services. These exercises consisted of jumping, dancing, and singing, clapping hands, whirling round and round, and resulted in fits of shaking similar to those they lay claim to extraordinary spiritual gifts besides the gift of tongues and of prophecy. They discard marriage, and declare that all external ordinances of religion ceased with the Apostles. Even now they exist in considerable numbers in the United States of America. Their chief settlement is in New Lebanon, but there are seventeen more in different parts of America. Some years ago a branch of these Shakers established themselves at Hordle in the New Forest, where they led a camp life under the guidance of their mother, Elizabeth Girling. She professed to be immortal, but in the year 1886 she died, to the dismay of her adherents. These have gradually dwindled down to an insignificant number; they suffered great privation, and would have been starved had not the neighbouring clergy and other charitable people ministered to their necessities. On the death of Mrs. Girling the society was broken up.

Shamrock.—The national badge of Ireland. Tradition says that it was adopted as such after the coming of St. Patrick to convert the Irish, A.D. 433: for in order to explain the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, he showed them a shamrock-leaf, saying, “Is it not as possible for the Godhead to comprise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as for these three leaves to grow upon a single stalk and to be three in one?” The Irish were at once convinced by his argument, and were converted to Christianity, in memory of which they have always regarded the shamrock as their national emblem.

Sharp, GRANVILLE, a great opponent of negro slavery, was born at Durham, where his father was prebendary, in 1734; died in London, 1813. He was educated for the bar, but never practised, and entered the Ordnance Office, which he left on account of the measures taken by the British Government at the outbreak of the American War. In 1769 he published a work on the Injustice and Dangerous Tendency of Tolerating Slavery in England, and soon after came forward on behalf of a negro named Somerset who had been brought to London, and on falling ill had been turned out of doors by his master. Sharp took care of him till he was cured, and then procured him a situation; but the master two years after captured and imprisoned him as a runaway slave. The case was tried, and referred to twelve judges, who finally declared, in May, 1772, that all slaves should be free on touching English soil. Sharp continued to write against slavery, and in 1787 was made chairman of the first meeting for the abolition of negro slavery.

Sharp, JAMES, Archbishop of St. Andrews, was born at Banff, 1618. He was educated at the University of Aberdeen, and in 1640 became Regent or Professor of Philosophy in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews, which post he soon exchanged for that of minister of Crail. In 1656 he was sent to London with some of the Resolutioners to plead their cause before the Protector. He had ingratiated himself with Cromwell, but ch raised on the formation of the See na, King of the West Saxons. This burnt by Sweyn, and the present minster commenced about 1060. In 1436 the , choir, and east end were destroyed by and rebuilt in the Perpendicular style by ots Bradford and Saunders [1436-1475]. een 1830 and 1858 it has undergone lete restoration. It is dedicated to St.

. Its first bishop, St. ALDHELM [q.v.]
by far the most noted. There were ten ops of Ramsbury or Wilton, the last one, nan, being consecrated in 1045, who in became Bishop also of Sherborne. Ed-
. VI. founded a King's School at Shere in 1550, which has an endowment of 00 a year, and several exhibitions at rd and Cambridge.

Sherlock, THOMAS, Bishop of London, the son of Dr. William Sherlock, was born in London in 1678. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he graduated in 1701.
Six years later his father, who was Master of the Temple, was appointed Dean of St.
Paul's, and his son Thomas was given the Mastership. He was afterwards successively Bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London.
He died in 1761. In politics he was a firm Tory and a strong upholder of the policy of Church and State. He was Hoadly's most formidable opponent in the BANGORIAN CON-TROVERSY [q.v.]. He was much esteemed as a preacher in his day, and published a volume of sermons, some of which are very fine.
Among his other literary works we may mention Use and Intent of Prophecy, and Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus.

Sherlock, WILLIAM, D.D., born in Southwark about 1641; died, 1707. He was educated at Cambridge, and, having held several London livings, was made Master of the Temple; this he held, with the exception of a few months at the time of the Revolution in 1689, till his death. His conduct at the time of the Revolution has been the subject of much criticism. At first, there is no doubt, he, with several other eminent Churchmen, refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new Government; but later, when he saw the new system working well and William apparently firmly settled, he changed his mind, took the oath, and was allowed to resume his duties at the Temple. Some writers say that he changed his mind on conscientious grounds, others that he did it solely with an eye to the main chance.
There is this to be said for him, that he received nothing whatever at the hands of the new Government, but remained what he had been before—the Master of the Temple. He vindicated his conduct in a pamphlet entitled
The Case of Allegiance to Sovereign Princes Stated. His fame as a writer was great, other works being: Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity and the Incarnation of the Son of God, and several treatises on Providence and Future Judgment.

Shiites.—One of the two chief divisions of Mahommedanism. Their religion has been the established one of Persia for the last four hundred years. After Mahommed they revere the memory of Ali, the fourth of the Caliphs who succeeded Mahommed. For this reason they are regarded as unorthodox by their rivals, the SONNITES [q.v.], who recognise the rights of the first three Caliphs. The Shiites hold Fatima, Mahommed's daughter and Ali's wife, in the greatest veneration, which is the only known instance of Mahommedans giving homage to a woman. When the Shiites are called to the mosques for prayer, they add to the usual declaration, "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is His prophet," the words,
"and Ali is His vicar." They occasionally on, CHARLES.—One of the chief party f this century in the Church of Eng- 54–1836]. He was Incumbent of Church, Cambridge, for more than s, and by the great influence of his personal piety, and his zeal and vigour as a preacher, he became the chief representative of the Low Church party, into the teaching of which he infused a larger element of Calvin-ism than it had hitherto possessed. His power with the undergraduates of the University was very great. “Charles Simeon’s preach- ing,” writes Dr. Stoughton, from his own pleasant recollections, “was not penetrating like dew, but coming down like hailstones and coals of fire. He spoke as one who had a burden from the Lord to deliver—as one who, like Paul, felt ‘Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel.’” Simeon’s Horæ Homileticæ is a work containing 2,536 sermon outlines upon the entire Scriptures, and of real value, though critical ability is not to be looked for. In his zeal for Calvinising the Church he founded a scheme for buying up advowsons, and the Clergy List gives eighty livings as in the gift of the Simeon Trustees.

Simeon Stylites [from stylos, “a pillar”], the originator of the custom of doing penance by living on a pillar, was born probably about 390 at Sisan, between Antioch and Cilicia. He was brought up by Christian parents, and when fifteen years old was in- duced to enter a monastery near his home, where he stayed two years, and then went to one at the foot of Mount Coryphus, where he spent ten years. But the austerities were not great enough for him, and he then lived as a hermit in a little house under the peak of the mountain Telanassus. Here he used to fast forty days at a time, in imitation of Moses and Elias. After three years he took possession of the peak, had a wall built round him, and fastened one end of a chain twenty cubits long to a great stone, and the other to his right foot, so that he could not if he wished leave his bounds. His fame spread over all the country, and the sick and palsied came from far and wide—even, it is said—from Spain, Britain, and Gaul, to be healed. At last, wishing to escape from them, he ordered a pillar six cubits high to be built, which was afterwards increased to twelve, twenty-two, and thirty-six. Here he lived for forty or fifty years, spending his time, as is related by his disciple Anthony, in working miracles, teaching the people, medi- tating, and praying. He died in 460. He was buried with great pomp at Antioch.

There were two other pillar saints of the name of Simeon, one being called Fulminatus from having been killed by lightning; he lived in the twelfth century, and seems to have been one of the last to adopt the practice.

Simon Magus.—In the second century the Christian Church was assailed by what proved a long and lasting trouble—viz. the appearance of heresy respecting the Person and Nature of Christ. That it had begun when St. John wrote, may be seen by his

It was by God's people before the giving v, and is enjoined both by ceremonial by the Apostles under the Christian ion. The public worship of the Christians consisted mainly in nging, which developed to a great when the persecutions ceased. The Bishop of London has been the Visitor of the College ever since its foundation, and the government of the whole body is carried on by the president, two deans, and four assist- ants, all of whom are elected by the Fellows to hold office for a year. In Defoe's time the College included almshouses for ten men and ten women. In 1884 the house in London Wall was sold, and the ground built over, and in 1886 a handsome building was erected on the Thames Embankment.

Sion, NOTRE DAME DE.—This is an Order which specially devotes itself to the bringing up of Jewish children in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church. The founder was M. Alphonse Ratisbonne, a Jew, who declares that he had always felt a strong antipathy to the teaching of Christianity until one day in 1842, while standing in a church at Rome, he saw a vision of the Virgin. He was so much impressed, that he was induced to study the question closely, and very soon after was baptised. His brother had previously been converted, and the two together determined to found an Order for the conversion of the Jews. This they did in Paris, and branches were soon established not only in France, but in England and the East, one standing in the Via Dolorosa at Jerusalem.

Si quis.—A name given to the notice appointed to be read in a parish church when any parishioner intends entering holy orders. The form of the notice, after the name and degree of the candidate have been given, is as follows:—"If any person (si quis) knows any just cause or impediment, for which the said M. N. should not be admitted into holy orders, he is now to declare the same, or to signify the same by letter forthwith to the Lord Bishop of——"

Sirmond, JACQUES, was born at Riom in Auvergne, in 1559; died at Paris, 1651. He studied at the Jesuit College at Billom, and in 1567 joined the Order. He was Professor of Rhetoric at Paris in 1590, then went to Rome to become Secretary to Aquaviva, General of the Jesuits. He remained there, studying the manuscripts in the Vatican library, until 1608, when he returned to Paris, and became Rector of the Collegethere in 1617, and Confessor to Louis XIII. in 1637.

Sirmond visited the libraries and archives of the convents, and saved many valuable manuscripts, which he published. He edited the Opuscles of Geoffrey, Abbot of Vendôme, and the works of Enodius, Bishop of Pavia; of Apollonius Sidonius; of Eugenius, Bishop of Toledo; the chronicles of Solatius and auricular confession; [4] the celibacy of the clergy; [5] vows of chastity; and [6] communion in one kind only.

Six Points. [RITUALISM.]

Sixtus, Sr.—St. Sixtus was a pupil of Pope Stephen, who was the first to suffer under the persecution of the Emperor Valerian, in the year 257. Three weeks after Stephen's death Sixtus was chosen Pope in his place, and held that dignity for about a year. His parents were Grecian, but he had been brought up in Rome, and was greatly attached to the Church in that city, where he had served the office of deacon. He carried on with great ability the controversy on the question of the validity of Baptism [See STEPHEN, POPE AND MARTYR], which had begun under the rule of his master. In the year 258 Valerian was engaged in wars with Persia, and left the government of Rome entirely in the hands of Marcian, a bitter enemy to the Church. He obtained from the Emperor an order for the execution of the whole clergy of Rome, and, as was natural, the Pope was the first to suffer. He was accompanied to the place of execution by Lawrence, his favourite pupil, whom he had recently ordained deacon. [LAWRENCE, Sr.]. St. Ambrose relates the following conversation as having taken place just before the execution. "Father," said Lawrence, "whither are you going without your son? You did not use to sacrifice without your deacon, why then am I now neglected? what have I done to deserve this hard treatment? Oh, take me with you, and see whether you have committed the Blood of Our Lord to a person unworthy of that honour. Allow me a share in your death, whom you have admitted to a share in the holy ministry." And St. Sixtus assured him that he did not leave him, for he would follow in three days. He was martyred Aug. 6th, 258. St. Cyprian also mentions this execution in a letter written to a bishop about that time, and adds that a man named Quartus, who was evidently famous among the Christians of that period, was beheaded with him.

Sixtus, Popes. [POPES.]

Skeleton Army.—A name given to the rough element of the population who made it their business to attack the Salvation Army by throwing missiles and otherwise interfering with them. They were more active in the earlier career of the latter, and more than once came into desperate collision with them, notably at Worthing, where damage was done both to persons and property.

Slavery.—It has been a matter of cavil by unbelievers that Christ gave no commands on the subject of slavery, that neither He nor His immediate successors, the Apostles, should have prohibited it, and that St. Paul, by sending back Onesimus to Philemon, and by exhort-

ing slaves to obedience, appears to countenance it. But at the time in which the Apostles lived, slavery was an organised system, and never worse in its conditions than at that time, and it was clear that its abolition could only be a matter of progressive growth or change, to be wrought by the mutual love which would spring up in the followers of Christ. His Kingdom was not of this world, and He did not use the world's weapons, but aimed to establish His Kingdom in each individual heart. Within the Church there was no distinction between the bond and free; all alike partook of its services, and it was felt that Christ's doctrines would ultimately produce freedom and equality outside the Church. St. Paul, while he preached equality in the sight of God, yet commanded the slaves to be obedient to their masters; he taught that the only true slavery was the slavery of sin. The Church in very early times included in her liturgy a prayer for them "that suffer in bitter bondage." As the Gospel spread, we hear of many masters, who on their conversion brought their slaves to be baptised, by which act they became free men. Mr. C. L. Brace, in his Gesta Christi (page 227), tells us of the many acts which were passed in early Christian times favourable to slaves, and mentions the fact that thirty-seven Church Councils passed laws concerning them. In the fourth century, in the reign of Constantine, the Christian Church was joined to the State, and laws were passed to facilitate the manumission of slaves. Under Justinian the great moral power of Christianity is most felt in the Roman laws on slavery. In the ninth century we meet with the first formal mention of a command from the Church against slavery in the words of St. Theodore of Stude. All who study the various laws about slavery from the time of Constantine to the tenth century must see that they sprang from Christian principle. The work was indeed a very gradual one, and slavery existed in the East up to the fourteenth, and in Greece to the fifteenth century. In the Middle Ages slavery was changed into the milder form of serfage. After slavery disappeared in Europe, it was largely introduced into America by the importation of the heathen negroes from Africa, and it was not till the close of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century that a steady opposition was made to it, which resulted in its complete abolition in America and our colonies. Smith, GEORGE [b. 1828, d. 1876].—An eminent Biblical explorer. He first earned his livelihood by steel engraving, but having taught himself the Eastern languages, and studied the Ninevite sculptures in the British Museum, he became known as a great Assyrian scholar, and was in 1873-4-5 sent out to Nineveh, where he gained much valuable devised a system of worship, if so it can be called, in which social happiness and joy were to be put before the mind by means of poetry, music, painting, etc. Like Owen, he resolved God into Nature, and defined Him as "all that is."

Putting its practical Atheism aside, there is a vein of truth in Socialism. It is the clear duty of those who have the power to promote in every possible manner the welfare of the vast numbers of their fellow men whose lot is daily labour. Property not only confers rights upon those who possess it, but it also implies duties to be fulfilled by them. Each man, rich or poor, is, whether he likes it or not, in some way his brother's keeper. But these truths are after all but the constant teaching of Christianity. Christianity is the most perfect form of Socialism; the latter says that "if man is ever to be made rational and happy, he must enter upon a new life, in which the spirit of universal charity and love will govern," whilst the former teaches that "love is the fulfilling of the law," and what is more, gives men the power to practise it.

Societies.—The various religious societies may be thus classified:—[1] Bible Societies; [2] Foreign Missionary Societies, [3] Home Missions; [4] Societies for the spread of Christian Knowledge; [5] Charitable Societies; [6] Societies for Promoting Special Objects; [7] Church Societies; [8] Roman Catholic Societies.

BIBLE SOCIETIES.

The principal of these is the British and Foreign; an account of all of them will be found under the above head.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETIES.

Anglo-Continental Society.—Instituted in 1853. Its object is to deal with Christians outside of England by making the principles of the Church of England better known in European countries. This it does by means of circulating religious publications in various foreign languages.

Baptist Missionary Society.—Founded 1792. Income, £87,828. Office: 19, Castle Street, Holborn.

China Inland Missions.—Office: 6, Ryland Road, Mildmay Park.

Christian Vernacular Education Society for India.—Founded 1858. Unsectarian. Income, £10,917. Office: Borough Road, London.

Church Missionary Society.—Founded 1799. Offices at Salisbury Square, Fleet Street. Income, £231,541. [An account of the formation and work of this Society is given under Missions.] In connection with it was formed in 1880 the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society by a branch of the Indian Female Normal School and Instruction Society, who thought the work might be better done by an exclusively Church society. The object of the society is to make known the Gospel of Christ to the women of the East in accordance with the Protestant and Evangelical teachings of the Articles and formularies of the Church of England. They have thirty-eight stations in the dioceses of Calcutta, Madras, Lahore, Travancore, and the missionary districts of Tinnevely. The work is carried out by ladies, Bible-women, and greatly helped by medical missions. Its income exceeds £20,000.

Colonial Missionary Society.—Founded 1836, to promote Christianity amongst settlers in British colonies and dependencies. Congregationalist. Income in 1885, £3,054. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street.

Evangelical Continental Society.—Founded in 1846. Income, £2,557. Unsectarian. Office: 13, Bloomfield Street, London Wall. Its object is the spread of the Gospel among Roman Catholics and others in Europe by the agency of native pastors, evangelists, etc.

Freedmen's Missions Aid Society, for the Christian education of the African race everywhere. Unsectarian. Office: 18, Adam Street, Strand.

General Baptist Missionary Society.—Founded in 1816. Income, £7,626. Office: 60, Wilson Street, Derby.

Indian Female Normal School and Instruction Society, or Zenana Bible and Medical Mission.—Founded in 1852. Unsectarian. Office: 2, Adelphi Terrace, Strand. Income, £10,228.

London Missionary Society.—Founded in 1795. Unsectarian, but supported chiefly by the Congregationalists. Income, £101,104. Office: 14, Bloomfield Street, London Wall, E.C.

Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.—This is the oldest missionary society, founded in 1701. Offices at 19, Delahay Street, Westminster. The objects of this Society are:—[1] to receive, manage, and dispose of funds contributed for the religious instruction of our fellow-countrymen beyond the seas; [2] to provide a sufficient maintenance for an orthodox clergy to live among them; [3] to make other provision for the propagation of the Gospel in those parts. Sufficient account of this Society has already been given. [BIBLE SOCIETIES; MISSIONS; PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL, SOCIETY FOR] In connection with the missions of this Society is the Ladies' Association for the Promotion of Female Education in India and other Heathen Countries. The objects of this Association are to provide female teachers for the instruction of native women and children in the missions of the Society, to provide suitable clothing for the female mission schools, and a maintenance for boarders. Funds for this are raised in England by branch associations throughout the country. The first teacher was sent to Madagascar in 1867, and in 1868 two ladies joined the Delhi Zenana Mission, and one went to Burmah. In 1869 the work was extended to South Africa. Many Zenana missions have since been formed in India, and working-men (communicants) as members. Office: 3, Tavistock Street, W.C.

Church of England Young Men's Society.—Founded in 1843 to promote the spiritual, social, and intellectual welfare of young men. Office: 3, St. Bride Street, Ludgate Circus.

Church Parochial Mission Society.—Founded after the London Mission of 1873, to provide clergymen who devote themselves exclusively to the conduct of missions. Office: 21, John Street, Adelphi.

Church Pastoral Aid Society.—Founded 1836. For the evangelisation of the home population, by means of the parochial organisation of the Church of England; this is done by money grants for the support of additional clergy and lay agents in parishes where local means for the purpose are inadequate. Income, £54,335. Office: Temple Chambers, Falcon Court, Fleet Street.

Church Penitentiary Association.—Founded in 1851. This society helps in the foundation and maintenance of Houses of Mercy and Refuges throughout the kingdom; these houses are mostly managed by self-devoted women, who give their services to the work. Income, £13,000. Office: 14, York Buildings, Adelphi.

Congregational Church Aid and Home Missionary Society.—Founded in 1819. Income, £36,707. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street.

Country Towns Mission.—Established 1837. To promote evangelical religion without reference to denominational distinctions among the working population and poor. Unsectarian. Income in 1885, £2,882. Office: 18, New Bridge Street, London, E.C.

Diocesan London Home Mission.—Founded in 1857, to send the Gospel to the multitudes of London whom the existing parochial machinery could not reach. This society's work is carried on in parishes where subdivision is desirable, and the missionary clergy are appointed by the bishop to take entire charge of new districts, to initiate and develop work in them, to preach in temporary buildings, dwelling-houses, or the open air, and thus to meet the spiritual destitution until the districts become organised parishes with permanent churches. Income, £4,977. Office: 121, Pall Mall, S.W.

English Congregational Chapel - Building Society.—Founded 1853, to aid in building suitable churches and residences. Income in 1884, £10,144. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street. Congregational Chapel-Building Societies are in operation for the districts of Lancashire and Cheshire, Liverpool, Scotland, etc.

Girls' Friendly Society.—Founded in 1875. Its objects are to bind together in one society ladies as associates, and working girls and young women as members, for mutual help, sympathy, and prayer; to encourage purity of life, dutifulness to parents, faithfulness to employers, and thrift; to provide the privileges of the society for its members, wherever they may be, by giving them an introduction from one branch to another. Office: 3, Victoria Mansions, Westminster, S.W.

Guild of the Holy Standard.—A society formed in 1873. It aims at promoting a higher tone of life as regards courage, temperance, purity, and manliness, and at exercising an influence for good among young soldiers.

Homes for Working Girls in London.—Founded in 1878 with a similar object to the Girls' Friendly Society. Office: 38, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

Incorporated Church Building Society.—Founded in 1818 to promote the work of church extension in England and Wales by making grants towards the building or enlarging of churches and chapels. Income, £6,770. Office: 2, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

Incorporated Free and Open Church Association.—Founded in 1866 with a view to promote a greater freedom of worship, by throwing the parish churches of the land open without restriction to the people. Office: 24, Bedford Street, Strand.

Irish Evangelical Society.—Congregationalist. Founded in 1814. Income, £1,573. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street.

London City Mission.—Founded 1835. Its simple object is to carry the Gospel from house to house in the densely-populated parts of the metropolis, without regard to denominational peculiarities. Unsectarian. It employs 463 missionaries. Income, £70,968. Office: 3, Bridewell Place, London, E.C.

London Congregational Chapel - Building Society, for promoting and aiding the building of additional places of worship in the metropolis for that body. Founded 1845. Worked in association with the London Congregational Church Extension Committee. Office: Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street.

London Lay Helpers' Association is under the presidency of the Bishop.

Methodist New Connexion Missionary Society.—Founded in 1826. Income, £9,700. Office: Sheffield.

Midnight Meeting Society.—Founded 1859 for rescue work. Income, £1,200. Office: 8A, Red Lion Square, E.C.

Mission to Hop-pickers.—This society was founded in Maidstone in 1877, to provide spiritual ministrations for immigrant hop-pickers. Secretary: Rev. J. Stratton, Ditton Place, Maidstone.

Missions to Deep Sea Fishermen, of whom there are 120,000 engaged in the North Sea all the year round. Office: 181, Queen Victoria Street.

Open-Air Mission.—For the proclamation of the Gospel by ministers and laymen in the open air of the cities and towns of Great Britain. Unsectarian. Income in 1885, according to the Established Church." Operations have been mainly directed to three objects: [1st] it has sought to increase means of education by multiplying the number of properly-constructed school buildings; [2nd] it has constantly been engaged in promoting the most approved system of education by the establishment of institutions training teachers, both male and female; [3rd] it has sought to improve the condition of the working classes by the establishment of the National School of Art, and by the occasional inspection and regulation of schools, by supplying from its depository reading sheets and lesson books, apparatus, etc., and by collecting and disseminating the most reliable information in regard to any temporary or permanent measure that may be obtained in the way of aid for educational objects. Office: 10, Sanctuary, Westminster.

Literature Society.—Founded in 1854 on non-sectarian principles. It is actively engaged in promoting the circulation of pure and interesting literature. Office: 11, Buckle Street, Strand.

Church and Chapel Union.—Founded in 1803. Income, £500. Office: 4, Trafalgar Square.

Sunday School Union.—Founded in 1803. Income, £6,081. Office: 13, Pall Mall, Strand.

Trinitarian Tract Society.—Founded in 1799 on the basis of united action on the part of Unitarians and Nonconformists in the promotion and circulation of Evangelical literature. The Committee has always been composed of an equal number of each body: both represented on its editorial staff; one of the ordinary Secretaries is always a clergyman of the Church of England, the other a Nonconformist minister. It helps largely in the distribution of tracts to India, China, Japan, etc. Income, £30,000. Office: 56, Paternoster Row.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.—Founded in March, 1698, by four laymen (John Hull, Sir H. Mackworth, Justice Colchester) and one clergyman (Thomas Bray, the great founder of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in Maryland of Compton, Bishop of London).

These were soon joined by others—Burnet, Strype the antiquary, Whitehead, John Evelyn, Samuel Wesley (brother of John and Charles), Bishop Wilson and Man, and Robert Nelson. The objects were: [1] The education of the poor. The first year they founded three schools (St. Botolph, Aldgate, and St. Dunstons), next year four more.

The National Society sprang from the first of this Society, and the two have worked most harmoniously. That the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has abandoned its educational work is due to the fact that last year £527 were raised as prizes in Training Colleges, and in 1880 the Society founded St. Katherine's Training College at Tottenham. [2] Hospital work was also taken in hand, and is still carried on abroad. Three grants for medicines and surgical appliances were in 1885 sent to the Medical Mission established by the Bishop of Victoria in China. [3] Bibles and prayer books, defensive and practical theological treatises, works of Christian history, are all issued regularly in great abundance, and given gratuitously to many poor parishes. [4] Grants of books to sailors, soldiers, emigrants, are regularly made, and an Emigration Committee aims at giving help by introductions and advice; and [5] foreign missions are helped each month of the year. The total amount of the grants in money and books in the year ending March 31st, 1885, was £47,180. Office: Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

Sunday School Union.—Founded 1803, for the promotion and raising of the standard in Sunday-school work. This is very largely done by the drawing up for three months in advance of a series of simultaneous "International Lessons," so that all schools joining the Union may study the same lessons. For these careful expository lessons are published a week or two in advance by writers of acknowledged ability, separate and special expositions being provided for young and for infant classes. Other helps are published and supplied at the lowest possible prices, and public training lessons, lectures, and examinations are also carried on. Unsectarian, but chiefly Nonconformist. Partly trading as publishers; benevolent income, £4,776. Offices: 56, Old Bailey, E.C.

Wesleyan Education Committee.—Founded in 1840. Income, £8,000. Office: 130, Horseferry Road, Westminster.

CHARITABLE SOCIETIES.

Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society.—Founded 1807, for the relief in pensions or asylums of the aged Christian poor of any Protestant denomination. Income, £6,810. Office: 83, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reedham.—Founded 1844. Undenominational. Income, £7,842. Office: 35, Finsbury Circus, E.C.

Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood.—Income, £30,000. Office: 36, King William Street, E.C.

Blind Pension Society of the United Kingdom.—Income, £2,936. Office: 235, Southwark Bridge Road.

Charity Organisation Society.—Object: To improve the poor, by propagating sound principles and views in regard to the administration of charity, by promoting the co-operation of charitable institutions for the furtherance of their common work; by finding work for the unemployed, by giving assistance where really needed, by repressing mendicancy, and endeavouring to prevent abuse of charity,

Church Defence Association.—Founded in 1860, to combat the Disestablishment controversy, to remove the ignorance which exists with regard to the history and status of the Church, to prove her claim to her endowments, and to show the use she has made of them for the welfare of the nation. The institution has a staff of lecturers thoroughly acquainted with the various aspects of the Disestablishment question, who systematically visit throughout the country, placing their services at the disposal of the clergy for meetings, discussions, etc. Income, £13,000.

joined the Catholic, Lutheran, or Calvinistic communion within two years they were to be exiled. The day fixed for their departure was Aug. 10th, 1660, when the law was carried out with the utmost severity, and the Socinians disappeared from Poland. Socinian views were taught in Germany by Ernst Soner (d. 1612), and some of the Polish exiles came and settled here, but the heresy soon died out. It took a firm hold in Transylvania, through Blandrata, one of the chief advocates of the Anti-trinitarian doctrines. It did not prosper in England, the only purely Socinian congregation being formed by John Biddle in Gloucester during the Commonwealth. He died in prison for heresy in 1662, and was succeeded by Thomas Firmin, but the congregation soon disappeared.

The doctrines of the Socinians are to be found in the Racovian Catechism and in the writings of Socinus and other great leaders of the society. The chief are:—that Christ did not exist before His birth; that He and the Holy Ghost are not God; that Christ's death was for Himself, not for His sins, but for the mortality and infirmities of our nature, which He had assumed; that God could justly pardon our sins without satisfaction; that Christ did not become our High Priest, nor immortal till He had ascended; that the soul of man becomes insensible at death and will be raised again with the body at the general resurrection; and that the good will be established in eternal felicity, while the wicked will be consigned only to a limited punishment.

Socrates was born at Athens in 469 B.C. He was the son of a sculptor, and followed the profession of his father till he was nearly forty years old, when he gave it up for that of a philosopher. He came to Athens about the time of the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. His career differed considerably from that of his contemporaries, inasmuch as he instituted no school, resented the title of teacher, and therefore had no followers in the accepted sense of the word. His plan of work was to walk about the streets of Athens, talking with his fellow-citizens on all sorts of subjects, leading them to express their views, and then proceeding to show them where their argument was faulty; for he believed firmly that he was designed by the gods to fulfil a religious mission, and that a divine teacher, a dæmon [divinity] was with him at all times, and was his teacher. Such was his conviction. But the same conviction led him to believe that his fellows had all their inward teachers, and therefore he questioned his companions in order to be instructed. Accordingly, he was no solitary thinker, but loved to draw a circle around him. And the young men of Athens loved to be drawn; for he was a humourist; he was genial, brave, patriotic. One young man there was whom Socrates regarded with intense affection, Alcibiades. He was skilful, handsome, fascinating in manner—all the qualities of the brilliant Greek were exhibited in him in their perfection. Had he also but learned that there is a right and a wrong, the whole history of Athens might have been different. Socrates would fain have taught him. But whilst he joyously listened to the bright teaching of the philosopher, he did not train himself to walk in the light which he found; he became selfish and wilful, and turned his best gifts into means of mischief.

The Socratic dialogue consisted of cleverly contrived questions of the philosopher, intended to draw out his companion, to lead him to think to reconsider his subject, to view it on all sides. His aim was to draw out the faculties; not to make them the supreme arbiter, but to bow them before a divine power. It was the very object of his life to do this, and it cost him his life. For he made virtue the foundation of all teaching and the aim of all intellectual exercise, and virtue was the pursuit of good and the rejection of evil. The Athenians would have cared nothing for his word-splittings; they were the most tolerant people in the world of abstract opinions. But he declared that he was not a promulger of opinions; that they were bound to know and to distinguish truth, that it was no matter of indifference. He was upon this accused of not worshipping the gods which the city worshipped, and of introducing divinities of his own. Alcibiades, too, who had proved a traitor to the State, was known to have been a learner from Socrates, and upon this fact was founded the charge that he was a corrupter of the youth of the State. He was brought before the judges of Athens, and his trial was the most momentous which up to that time the world had ever seen. By a majority of six, 282 against 276, he was pronounced guilty. There was a chance of escape for him. The penalty was death, but the smallness of the majority would probably have induced the judges to inflict some lighter punishment. He was asked to speak for himself, and he boldly answered as follows: "And what shall I propose on my part, O men of Athens? Clearly that which is my due. And what is that which I ought to pay or to receive? What shall be done to the man who has never had the wit to be idle during his whole life; but has been careless of what the many care about—wealth, and family interests, and military offices, and speaking in the assembly, and magistracies, and plots, and parties? Reflecting that I was really too honest a man to follow in this way and live, I did not go where I could do no good to you or to myself; but where I could do the greatest good, privately, to every one of you. Thither I went, and sought to persuade every man among you that he must look to himself, and seek virtue and wisdom before he looks to his private interests, and not think of

Robert; the first with a date, Wilmund Mac Aulay, a monk of Furness Abbey, to which abbey the election of the bishops belonged; he was consecrated in 1109. There is mention of a bishop named John about 1164, and Bishop Simon about 1226, Bishop Mark 1303, and Huan Hosketh 1610.

Under the bishop, the see is governed by an archdeacon and a vicar-general. The income of the diocese is £2,000 per annum. According to ancient custom an annual convocation of the Manx Church is held on the Thursday in Whitsunweek. The island contains thirty-three parishes. There was in 1883 a great discussion about the building of a cathedral and whether it should be at Douglas or at Peel. Nothing has yet been done in the matter. Peel contains the ruins of two cathedrals—those of St. Patrick and St. German—both on a small island in the harbour; churches were erected in those situations in olden times for safety, as at Holy Island and Iona. The whole of the ancient traditions of episcopacy are associated with Peel. Besides the cathedral dedicated to St. German, other bishops of Sodor, in like manner, have given their names to Manx localities, as St. Brendan to Turk Braddan, St. Michael, Machutus or Manghold, etc. It is impossible to fix the date of the original structure of St. German's; the choir, the oldest part of the present building, is generally acknowledged to have been rebuilt by Bishop Simon [1226-47], while the nave and transepts belong to a later period. The church is cruciform, and the architecture a mixture of Early English and Decorated. Until the close of the last century the bishops were enthroned here, but its roofless condition now renders the ceremony impossible. Several bishops are buried here, the tomb of most interest is that of Bishop Rutter, the friend of Charlotte de la Tremouille, who assisted her in the defence of Lathom House from Fairfax. A child of Bishop Wilson's is also buried here. Under the chair is a crypt, which till 1780 was used as a dungeon for ecclesiastical, and sometimes civil, offenders. In it Eleanor Cobham, wife of Humphry Duke of Gloucester, was confined for witchcraft during four years.

Solidians (from Latin solus alone and ides faith), the name that was frequently given to those who first adopted the doctrine of justification by faith alone and not by works.

Somascha, THE REGULAR CLERKS OF, an order formed at the beginning of the sixteenth century by St. Jerome Emiliani, a Venetian, born in 1481. He was of noble birth, and had served in the campaigns against Charles VIII. and Louis XII., but was taken prisoner whilst defending the town of Castelnovo, and on his deliverance devoted himself to the service of God. He first took charge of some orphan nephews, but in 1528 founded an orphan asylum at Venice, and afterwards others at Milan, Bergamo, Pavia, and other towns. The central point from which all the institutions were managed was fixed at Somascha, between Milan and Bergamo. It was first worked by laymen, but Emiliani was afterwards joined by some priests, and they were gradually formed into an order. The founder died in 1533, was beatified by Benedict XIV, and canonised by Clement XIII. The order was confirmed in 1568 under the rule of St. Augustine, and received the name of Regular Clerks of St. Mayeul, or of Somascha. It was for a time united with the Theatines, and in the seventeenth century with Fathers of the Christian Doctrine. It extended rapidly, and has the charge of several orphanages and colleges. The principal house is at Rome.

Sonnites or Sunnis are a sect of Mahomedans who are strongly opposed in every way to the Shiites [q.v.] They are very numerous, the Shiites being confined for the most part to Persia. The Sonnites are sometimes called Traditionists, on account of their looking upon the sunna or traditions as of equal authority with the Koran. They recognise the rights of all four Caliphs who immediately succeeded Mahomet, and this is one of the great points of difference between them and the Shiites, who reject all but Ali, the fourth. They are subdivided into four parties, but the difference consists chiefly in ceremonials and ritual—all uniting in fundamental doctrine and in hatred of the Shiites.

Sorbonne, a celebrated college founded at Paris in 1262 by Robert Norbon, chaplain to Louis IX., within the University of Paris. It was originally intended for sixteen poor theological students, four of whom were to be French, four Norman, four Picard, and four English. The congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268. A teacher of theology was appointed, the college became formed, most of the Paris doctors of theology were trained there, and when the lectures of the faculty began to be held there, the college and the faculty became identified. During the first three centuries after its foundation it thrived wonderfully, and is noted

He remained at Islip writing and preaching against Puritanism till his death. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. The most famous of his works are his sermons, which are characterised by vigorous sense and sound English.

Southcott, JOANNA.—A fanatical woman, born in Devonshire about the middle of the last century, who gave herself out as the bride of the Lamb, and announced, when she was over sixty years old, that she was about to give birth to the Messiah. She published a collection of her "prophecies" in shilling parts: they consist of wild rhodomontade, interspersed with doggrel verse, and form two large 8vo volumes. It speaks very badly for the state of intelligence and education, that at the time of her death she had thousands of followers, and after her death [Dec. 27th, 1814] many of them continued to observe the ceremonies she had prescribed, so that till a very few years since there were congregations who still called themselves after her name.

Southwell, BISHOPRIC OF.—This See was constituted in 1884, its first bishop being Dr. George Ridding. It is taken from the dioceses of Lincoln and Lichfield, and comprises the whole counties of Nottingham and Derby, including 471 parishes besides chapelries, with an area of 1,182,419 acres, and a population of 699,152. The endowment of the See is £3,000 a year. There are two archdeaconries, but as yet no cathedral body. The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, or Southwell Minster, is in every way worthy to be advanced to the rank of a cathedral. No other of the newly-constituted cathedrals of the last half century can approach it in dignity of design and beauty of architecture, with its massive Norman nave and western and central towers, Early English choir, and Decorated chapter-house. Southwell Minster, though never formally recognised as a cathedral church, was regarded by the Archbishops of the Northern Province, until the severance of the county of Nottingham from the province and diocese of York in 1839, almost as a secondary cathedral for that remote part of their wide-stretching spiritual domain. Possibly the site of a Romano-British church; most probably, according to early and consistent tradition accepted by some of our most careful historians, one of the centres of Paulinus's missionary labours, c. 630, after the conversion of the men of Lindsey, and the erection of the first Christian church in the Roman city of "Lindum Colonia," the modern Lincoln; rebuilt and endowed by the ubiquitous Wilfrid, in the five last years of his life, 705-9; augmented by Edwy's grant of his royal demesnes in the soke of Southwell to Archbishop Oskytel in 958, and re-founded or re-modelled (according to the statement of Henry VIII.'s Commissioners) by Edwy's brother Edgar, after the middle of the tenth century, when the first three prebends were probably founded, and the church, endowed with the great tithes of the soke, became collegiate; furnished with large and sonorous bells by Archbishop Kinsy [1051-60], at the same time that he bestowed like gifts on the minsters of Beverley and Stow; constituted by Kinsy's successor Ealdred [1061-69] a college of secular canons, for whose use, according to the reformed rule of Chrodegang, he erected a common refectory, as he had done at York; established as the Mother Church of the county of Nottingham by Archbishop Thomas II., freed by him from all episcopal customs and dues, placed on the same standing as St. Peter's at York, St. John's at Beverley, and St. Wilfrid's at Ripon, and enriched with royal privileges and immunities; the seat of a yearly synod for the county, at which the consecrated chrism, brought solemnly from York, was distributed to the rural deans, to be by them dispensed to the parish priests; at Whitsuntide the object of yearly processions by the clergy and laity of the whole county of Notts, released from the ancient duty of repairing to York to pay their Pentecostals, to which came the mayor and corporation of Nottingham with the justices of the peace, on horseback, in their most magnificent array, to lay down their Whitsun farthings under the wide Norman archway of the great north porch, where the treasurer of the Chapter stood to receive them—a time-honoured custom, only abolished little more than a century ago by Archbishop Drummond, "proprio motu," as a meaningless survival from the past—it is evident that Southwell Minster has always occupied a place of peculiar dignity and importance in the organisation of the vast diocese of York. In later times it more than once narrowly escaped destruction. In 1540 it surrendered its possessions to Henry VIII., and was re-founded by him in 1543; in 1547 it was seized by the Crown, but re-founded by Queen Mary in 1558; in 1604 still further established by James I., to be once more suppressed in our own days, and by a melancholy but just Nemesis on luxury and inefficiency under the guise of religion, reduced to the level of an ordinary parish church, it is now happily raised to more than its pristine dignity as the cathedral of the newly-formed diocese.

It must be confessed that the history of the collegiate church is not an edifying one before its final extinction on the death of the last prebendary in 1873. The number of prebendaries was sixteen. It was an acephalous body without a dean, or even any permanent president, such as the precentor was at St. David's, and the archdeacon at Llandaff, both of whose chapters were dean-less. Few professedly religious foundations could show smaller grounds for exemption from the axe occasion Reformed congregations from Seville and Malaga attended with that of Madrid, and the Spanish Reformed Church was solemnly constituted. In Portugal also Reformed congregations were established, whom Bishop Riley also visited. Several of these were ministered to by men who had been Roman Catholic priests. In the course of the year a Liturgy was drawn up, partly from that of the Church of England, partly from the old Mozarabic Liturgy. The last report gives 13 ordained ministers of the Reformed Church in Spain, eight of whom are ex-Roman priests, the others have received American orders. They have besought the English Church to consecrate their bishops-elect; but a difficulty was felt by the English Bishops on the ground that the Roman Bishops, though held to be in grievous error, are yet in possession; and the English Church, following the universal precedent from the beginning, has refused to be a party to what many ecclesiastical authorities hold to be a schism. Those who argue thus, whilst they look hopefully on the Reform movement, are desirous that the Reform shall be carried on from within. Nevertheless, there are others who strenuously declare that the Reformed Episcopal Churches ought to stand aloof no longer, but fill the gap and consecrate the bishops. The following passage from a recent address by Archbishop Plunket puts the case very earnestly :—

“A remarkable movement in the direction of Church Reform has taken place during late years in Spain and Portugal. Five-and-twenty years ago there were not a score of native Protestants in these countries. There are now some ten thousand. The faithfulness and courage with which these brave-hearted men, in the face of tremendous odds, have battled their way out of error into light and truth, is beyond all praise, and towards all who have so done, even though they follow not after us, we should be ready to extend a helping hand. But among these Reformers there are some with whom English and Irish Churchmen should especially sympathise. I speak of those who, after the example of our own forefathers, have organised themselves on an Episcopal basis, and have adopted a fixed Liturgy, purged, like our own, from Roman error, but wisely shaped, as in our own case, upon the model of an ancient national ritual. The number of these Reformers is not as yet large. About two thousand in Spain, and about one thousand in Portugal, may be counted as belonging to their ranks. But the congregations into which they are gathered occupy important centres in these two countries. In Spain they are to be found in Madrid, Seville, Malaga, Salamanca, Valladolid, and in the neighbourhood of Barcelona. In Portugal we meet them in Lisbon, Rio de Mouro, and Oporto. Moreover, though thus widely separated from one another, these scattered flocks are bound together even already by a sense of corporate unity, which adds not a little to their power for good. Each congregation has its vestry, and both in Spain and Portugal there is a central Synod attended by delegates from these vestries, where in each case the foundation of a Reformed Episcopal Church has been solemnly and prayerfully laid. In Spain the Synod has chosen a Bishop-Elect. In Portugal it is purposed to do likewise when the right opportunity presents itself. So far, therefore, as an outward organisation goes, the elements of cohesion and continuity are duly provided. But there are, thank God, closer and more sacred bonds than these. Speaking as one who has twice visited the Peninsula for the special purpose of testing the reality of this movement, I can certify without reserve to the fact that these Reformers are becoming daily more and more knit one to another by love and devotion to a common Master—the great Shepherd and Bishop of their souls—and by a profound conviction that they have a work of evangelisation to do for Him in their native land! Such are some of the hopeful features of this movement. Did time permit, I could point to many more. I could show from its history that it is a movement from within, and that, though foreign agencies, especially in the way of Bible circulation, have done much to help the work, their function has been not so much to create a desire for reform as to meet an already existing want. I could also show that this want is not due to merely political aspirations, or to any ephemeral burst of enthusiasm, but that it is in very truth a craving for somewhat more satisfying in the way of spiritual food than Rome can supply. But I must pass from the hopes of the movement to its needs—for it is because of these needs that I have felt constrained to take up my pen. These Reformers, like the early Christians, are few, and poor, and weak. None of the wealthy or the mighty ones of this earth have, up to this, joined their little band, and hence they find it impossible as yet to stand alone. They do not ask us to undertake the work of Reformation in their land. They are already engaged in that work, and all they ask of us is to help them in accomplishing it themselves. Nor do they ask us to help them thus for ever. Ere long they hope to be self-supporting. But just at present, though, as I can vouch, they are contributing according to their ability, they find it hopeless, without aid, to meet their own spiritual needs. And for this aid they have appealed to us. We have not gone out of our path to look for this duty. We have found the wounded traveller on the very highway by which we have been journeying. Can we, with a clear conscience, pass him by on the other side? The next few years will be to these Reformers a season of terrible suspense. In adopting for their alter their resolution in favour of a rabbinical education. Let it be remembered that the youth thus linked to men of various lands—for his father was a Portuguese Jew—was bound to one nation only by spiritual affinity, and that a nation without a home, and the course of the earnest young Jew's mental life will be more easily followed. The education of the Jews was almost exclusively religious, the Old Testament and the Talmud forming their principal studies. Spinoza entered into them with almost fanatical zeal, which, backed by remarkable penetration and subtlety, won the admiration of his instructor, the Chief Rabbi, Saul Levi Morteira. At fourteen Spinoza rivalled almost all the doctors in the exactitude and extent of his biblical knowledge. But he pursued his inquiries further than they could follow him, and put questions which they could not solve. Thus, because he found no mention of the doctrine of Immortality in the Old Testament, and because he was dissatisfied with some of the interpretations of the Law which his Rabbis gave, and those the interpretations which Christ Himself had rebuked, he was accused of heresy, and excommunicated from the Synagogue. [See the terrible curse quoted at length in Mr. Martineau's Types of Ethical Theory, i. 258.] His friends and relations were forbidden to hold intercourse with him, but he made some new friends, particularly Franz Van den Ende, who had a great influence on his life; he was a physician in Amsterdam who kept a philological seminary, and is said to have been a political plotter and an atheist. Some years later he was hanged in Normandy for conspiracy. He taught Spinoza Latin, which he learnt with great ease, and which was very valuable to him. At this time the works of Descartes fell into his hands, and he studied them eagerly. He left Amsterdam in 1660, and retired to Rhynsburg, near Leyden, where he carried on a trade, as all Jews were taught to do. His was that of a maker of telescopes, microscopes, etc., but he devoted all his spare time to philosophy. In the next year he moved to Woorburg, a small village near the Hague, and finally to the Hague itself. Here he frequently attended the Calvinistic worship, and expressed the deepest admiration for the character of Christ and the writings of St. Paul; but he was never baptised, nor called himself a Christian. He was offered the professorship of philosophy at Heidelberg, but refused, conscious that the philosophy he would teach was too closely allied to theology not to trench on its dogmas. He resigned the heritage which fell to him on his father's death to his sisters, refused to accept the property which his friend, Simon de Vries, had intended to leave to him, and also the pension offered to him by Louis XIV., and continued his labours in the greatest poverty, sometimes, it is said, expending on his food only 2½d. a day. He died Feb.

Spinoza's system is the logical development of the system of Descartes, though the two philosophers differed on many points. Spinoza's first published work was an Abridgment of the Meditations of Descartes, with an appendix containing the germs of the Ethica, and Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. This work contains a rationalistic criticism of the Bible, and an attack on the institution of the priesthood as injurious to the general welfare. He also explained in it that philosophy and theology have nothing in common. This book was at once condemned and forbidden in every country, and many artifices were used to introduce it into the various countries under different names. But Spinoza is chiefly known by Ethica More Geometrico Demonstrata, which contains a statement of his doctrines drawn up in a mathematical form, and which has gained for him the name of "The Euclid of Metaphysicians." He gives eight definitions, and seven axioms. The eight definitions are:—

1. By a thing which is its own cause, I understand a thing, the essence of which involves existence, or the nature of which can only be considered as existent.

2. A thing finite is that which can be limited (terminari potest) by another thing of the same nature; e.g. body is said to be finite because it can always be conceived as larger. So thought is limited by other thoughts. But body does not limit thought, nor thought limit body.

3. By substance I understand that which exists in itself, and is conceived per se; in other words, the conception of which does not require the conception of anything else antecedent to it.

4. By attribute I understand that which the mind perceives as constituting the very essence of substance.

5. By modes I understand the accidents (affectiones) of substance; or that which is in something else, through which also it is conceived.

6. By God I understand the Being absolutely infinite, i.e. the substance consisting of infinite attributes, each of which expresses an infinite and eternal essence.

7. That thing is said to be free which exists by the sole necessity of its nature, and by itself alone is determined to action. But that thing is necessary, or, rather, constrained, which owes its existence to another, and acts according to certain and determinate causes.

8. By eternity I understand existence itself, in as far as it is conceived necessary to follow from the sole definition of an eternal thing.

The seven axioms are:—

1. Everything which is, is in itself or in some other thing.

2. That which cannot be conceived through "the Deity passing into activity, but not exhausted by the act." A spirit so subtle and eager to see all sides of truth has thus paid the penalty to be expected, namely, that of being made the subject of disputes and misunderstandings innumerable. Considering that he arrived independently at ideas which are found in St. Augustine, and that modern German philosophers, from Kant downwards, have revered him as a master, it cannot be doubted that his teaching must contain many elements of value. One of those who knew him best, describes him as "a God-intoxicated man." But the deepest and subtlest analysts not unfrequently find themselves baffled. Thus Dr. Martineau, in a close and exhaustive examination of his works [Types of Ethical Theory, i. 247-393], declares that there are passages which are so ambiguous that controversialists on opposite sides may fairly claim him on their side. He shows that Spinoza's belief in the immortality of the soul, as expressed in the treatise on God, was real and strong, not, as has been alleged, "a mere accommodation to a discarded philosophy" [p. 374]. But in the Ethics he becomes vague, and a mystic cloud seems to have gathered over the future, the belief in immortality seeming to change into that of absorption into God, and the loss of individual consciousness.

Spiritual Works of Mercy. [MERCY, SPIRITUAL AND CORPORAL WORKS OF.]

Spiritualism, Spiritualists. — Spiritualism had its origin in America in 1848, when certain rappings in the house of Mr. Fox, at Hydeville, New York, were heard, which could not be accounted for, and by which it was said communications could be held with the spirits of the departed. These raps were arranged into a sort of alphabetical order for the purpose of the supposed communications, and were supplemented by the motion of articles of furniture about the room, the disembodied spirits being said to have discovered the means of discoursing by electric detonation; then musical instruments were said to sail about the room and utter unearthly melodies; sentences were written by unseen hands; shadowy forms were descried in the darkness; light touches felt; and lastly, the complete embodiment of a spirit so far as to be recognised by relatives. The spirits were also said to give their names. The believers in these manifestations increased very rapidly, and many converts were made in England, while in the United States it is said that at one time no fewer than 30,000 "spirit mediums" were practising. The doctrines of Spiritualists are much as follows: "God is a Spirit, and the visible universe is an expression to man of His Infinite Life. Man is a spiritual being: each individual spirit is a part of the great oversoul, or anima mundi. The spirit is enthralled in a body during this life; when released it at once enters upon the possession of higher powers and more extended knowledge, and its condition is one of regularly progressive advancement. Disembodied spirits are able to hold converse with those in the body; not with all immediately, but through the instrumentality of privileged or specially gifted persons called Mediums, who are on occasion influenced, or, as they term it, controlled by the spirits. Spirits can also apply force to physical objects, perform certain actions, such as writing, and produce sounds; they can sometimes show themselves in materialised forms, some of the material being borrowed from the medium. A new era is now dawning on us. The old religions, Christianity included, have played their part, and must pass away in face of clearer light. By intercourse with the spirit world, man will advance as he never has advanced before in knowledge, purity, and brotherly love" [Paper read at Durham Church Congress, by Rev. R. Thornton, D.D.]. Among the Spiritualists who have attracted most notice have been Douglas Home, who gave sittings before Napoleon III. and Alexander II. of Russia, and Robert Dale Owen [b. at Glasgow, 1801; d. 1877], who emigrated to the United States, and became the most prominent of the Spiritualists. His publications on this subject are Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World [1860] and The Debatable Land between this World and the Next [1872]. Spiritualism has been claimed by some as an adjunct to the Christian religion, by others as a substitute for it. As an adjunct, it is rejected by almost all the leaders of the Christian Communion; as a substitute, it involves the virtual setting aside, more or less completely, of the authority of Holy Scripture and of the teaching of the Church Universal. Some have not inaptly called it a "ghastly caricature of religion." The author from whom we have already quoted, Dr. Thornton, thus admirably sums up what may be said in its favour:—

"Now, there is much of the Spiritualist teaching with which the Church can most cordially agree.

"[1] It is a system of belief, not of mere negation of all that is not logically demonstrated. Its adherents are not ashamed to avow that they hold as true, propositions which are incapable of mathematical proof. They are at least theists, if no more; certainly not atheistic.

"[2] It is in its very nature antagonistic to all Sadduceeism and Materialism. It flatly contradicts the assertions of the miserable philosophy that makes the soul but a function of the brain and death an eternal sleep. It proclaims that man is responsible for his actions, against those who would persuade us that each deed is but the resultant of a set of forces, an effect first and then a cause in an eternal and immutable series of causes and effects, and that sin and holiness are therefore words without meaning. It tells of angels, of an immortal spirit, of a future state of personal and conscious existence.

"[3] It inculcates the duties of purity, charity, and justice, setting forth as well the loving Fatherhood of God as the brotherhood of men, to be continued, with personal recognition, in the future life.

as sponsors to their children, but forbidden in the ninth century. It posed in 1689 that they should be the privilege. It was not carried at, but has been since. The number of in the English Church is now three, going to the ancient custom in this—two godfathers and one godmother male, two godmothers and a godfather male. In the Roman Church it is necessary to have one god-parent, though there are sometimes more; and in this no person is allowed to marry his or her sponsor. It was formerly the law in the Church that the sponsor might not be the parent of his or her godchild, but now repealed.

Office of sponsors for infants is twofold: 1st, that of acting in their name in making public renunciation of the devil and his works, confession of faith in Christ, promises of a holy life; 2nd, that of guiding and securing for the child by their endeavours, not only a bare knowledge of the principles of the Gospel, but, as may be, a practical acquaintance with the important vows made for them in baptism and the solemn consecration of heart and life which they involve.

The rubric at the end of the Catechism reads: Every one shall have a Godfather or a Godmother as a witness of their Confirmation,” and the sponsor is to be distinguished from the official Sponsor.

The provision of the Prayer Book is a relic of still more ancient usage. Thus Archbishop Walter in the Council of Oxford, Lyndwood, L. 1, tit. De Sac. Unc. cap. 10, ordered that parents should not be sponsors to their children at Confirmation: ad Confirmationem nullus puer teneatur vel matre.” Lyndwood glossing the teneatur says that the candidate is held [between the right hand] by another, to signify that he has not yet received his full baptism. The same idea is very beautifully set out by St. Thomas Aquinas, who says: “Confirmation we are given the fullness of Christ for the spiritual conflict, and the confirmand, being not yet girded with weapons, is upheld by his sponsor to signify that as yet he is weak and an immature Christian.” “quasi adhuc imbecillis et puer.” In the past as in old times the candidate for baptism was presented by a sponsor, so is the candidate for the spiritual knighthood. The custom of appointing a Confirmation sponsor is still observed on the Continent.

It may be allowed to regret that this custom has been allowed to fall into desuetude, and surely would be exceedingly helpful to young people both at and subsequently to Confirmation that they should have an elder who should remind them of the solemn nature of the vows they had made and of the use they are to make of their full privileges as members of the Church. If the old custom were to be followed of the candidate being led up to the bishop by his sponsor, this would give the sanction of an outward solemnity to a very real spiritual bond. It may well be thought that a revival of this ancient custom so clearly indicated in the Prayer Book might result, by God's blessing, in a far larger percentage of our candidates becoming communicants, and, of what is of more importance, persevering in the better thoughts and purposes God gave them at Confirmation. For this sponsorial relationship would be no temporary one, but would involve the ties of a permanent spiritual friendship. There can be little doubt that in this would be found a real spiritual work for our lay communicants which would be of true interest to them and of real advantage to their own souls. It would, in fact, to a great extent do what is good and useful in John Wesley's idea of class-leadership while, like everything on old Church lines, avoiding its many dangers.” [E. G. W. in Ely Diocesan Remembrancer.]

Sports, Book of—or, as it is sometimes called, Declaration of Sports—was issued by James I. in 1618. In the earlier days of the Reformation no difference had been made in the observance of Sunday from what it had been in the Middle Ages, when, after Morning Service, all sorts of games and sports were indulged in on the village green. The Puritans, however, set up a far more severe standard of discipline, taking as their model the old Jewish Sabbath, and following the rules laid down in the Old Testament. [SABBATH]. The first action taken by the Puritans was in Lancashire, where they endeavoured to enforce the strict observance, and the magistrates took their side. King James happened to pass through on his way from Scotland to London, and on being appealed to decided against the Puritans. After he had left, news was brought that the villagers, not content with the permission to indulge in their sports after Morning Service, had, in several instances, met together for amusement at the very door of the Church with the intention of disturbing the worshippers. The result was the Declaration of Sports, first published for use in the diocese of Lancashire, but afterwards extended to the whole kingdom. The King announced in this declaration that “no lawful recreation should be barred to his good people which should not tend to the breach of the laws of his kingdom and the Canons of the Church.” The lawful games were archery, dancing, leaping, vaulting, and the setting-up of May-poles. It was stipulated, however, that no one should be allowed to take part in the sports who had not first been present at Divine Service. He did not issue this declaration in the usual way as an Order of Council, but commanded that na, and settled at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. He began his controversy with OSIANDER concerning the Atonement of Christ; and held that Christ is our Mediator with respect to His humanity; for that if He were mediator with respect to His Divinity, He was inferior to the Father in His Divine nature, and could not be co-essential with God the Father. Thus, he asserted, those who maintained that Christ was a Mediator in His own head revived the Arian heresy. He returned to Poland in 1558, where he excited no commotions, and he wrote Apologia pro Osiandrum de Trinitate, and was strongly opposed by Blandrata, Lismanini, etc. The Calvinists did not long survive their founder, and soon became absorbed in the Socinians.

Stanislas Kostka, S.J., a Polish saint, Oct. 28th, 1550, was the younger son of Stanislas Kostka, senator of Poland. He and his elder brother Paul were educated together by a Jesuit, John Bilinski, who afterwards accompanied them to the large Jesuit college of Cracow. Stanislas was of a more serious disposition than his brother, and was very particular in the choice of his companions; Paul and Bilinski were fond of excitement and dissipation, and were perpetually taunting him and trying to tempt him to share their pleasures. He was seized with a dangerous illness, and on his recovery vowed that he would forever give up the world altogether and devote the life of a monk. He took his vows in the monastery of SS. Simon and Jude's Day, 1567, and by incurring the violent wrath of his father. He had not been long in Rome before he was seized with a violent fever, of which he died.

Aug. 15th, 1568, before he had completed his eighteenth year. He was beatified in 1604, and canonised by Benedict XIII. in 1726. His festival is kept on Nov. 13th, the anniversary of the translation of his relics. He is highly regarded by the Poles as one of their chief saints, and is the patron saint of many of their principal towns.

Stanley, ARTHUR PENRHYN, Dean of Westminster [b. at Alderley, Cheshire, where his father was rector, Dec. 13th, 1815; d. in London, July 18th, 1881]. In January, 1829, entered as a scholar at Rugby, where he displayed a remarkable talent for history, and a very retentive memory, but an incapacity for the study of mathematics, which was a serious drawback to his progress. He entered at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1832, where he gained the Newdigate prize for a poem on The Gipsies; and in 1840-1 travelled in Greece for the purpose of pursuing his classical studies. His father was appointed to the bishopric of Norwich in 1837. On his return to England, Stanley began his career as a college tutor, and met with good success. His lectures displayed more than ordinary ability, and he became known by two works which he published, a Life of Arnold, which appeared in 1844, and Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age [1846], which took an entirely new line in dealing with the lives of the Apostles. He was made secretary to the first Oxford Commission; and in 1850, in writing in the Edinburgh Review on the Gorham judgment, he began a series of criticisms on ecclesiastical questions. In 1851 he was appointed Canon of Canterbury, and during the years in which he held that office he wrote a Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians; Memorials of Canterbury; and Sinai and Palestine, a delightful volume, in which he brought the observation of his travels to bear upon the Sacred History. It was in consequence of this volume that he was appointed by the Queen to accompany the Prince of Wales in his tour in the East in 1862. He had previously made a tour in Russia, which led him to deliver lectures on its history, published in 1861. He became Dean of Westminster in 1863, and soon afterwards married Lady Augusta Bruce, who was equally in earnest with himself in the labours which he undertook among the people of Westminster, while neither lost sight of the duties which they owed to society. Dean Stanley devoted himself to beautifying the Abbey, and making it popular, and to cultivating the friendship and religious feeling of the poor of the neighbourhood, and he spent much time in lecturing and preaching in all causes for the good of the people. His tenure of the office of Dean was an epoch which will never be forgotten in the history of Westminster and of the religious life of England. He was a Broad Churchman, always eager to promote union with other denominations. His wife died in 1875; this was felt by him as a lifelong sorrow. He was never the same man again; but he was brave in his endurance, and did not neglect his good and holy work, and in 1878 he visited America, where he was cordially received, and delivered numerous addresses and sermons. His other works, are:—Lectures on the Jewish Church, three series [1863-79]; Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey [1868]; Essays on Church and State [1870]; a History of the Church of Scotland [1872]; Christian Institutes [1881]; Memoirs of his Father and Mother, Edward and Catherine Stanley; and numerous articles in reviews.

Stanley's courageous endeavours to promote union with Nonconformists, and also to protect the freethinking divines of the Church of England, notably, the writers of ESSAYS AND REVIEWS [q.v.] and BISHOP COLENSO [q.v.], exposed him to many hard words. But his courage made him popular even with those who opposed him, and his conspicuous piety and philanthropy were admitted on all hands. His funeral in Westminster Abbey was a marvellous spectacle, from the crowds which gathered to it representing sendation, Luther was called to Wittemberg. In 1519 he wrote and offered Luther a seat at Salzburg, whither he had retired; but the latter was displeased that his had drawn back from the Reformation, and submitted to the Roman Church naming Vicar to the Archbishop of Prague. The severance of their friendship, however, did not take place till 1521, when Luther finally withdrew himself from Rome, alarmed at the storm raised around the former. Staupitz about this time became the Order of the Benedictines, and their Abbot, at Salzburg, in 1522. When he drew back from the Reformers, not oppose them, he saw the abuses of the Roman Church, but was not sufficient to withstand them. He was regarded by Luther as being cold and pusillanimous.

Matt, JOSEPH [b. at Abingdon, Berks, 1713; d. at Knaphill, Bucks, 1713].—He lived the greater part of his life in London, where he was in charge of a Baptist chapel in Devon-square. He was the author of several works, of which the best known is Another's work is done. He also wrote a tract, Fundamentals Without a Foundation, a True Picture of the Anabaptists.

Stephen, Sr., patron saint and apostle of Hungary, was the son of Geyza, fourth of Hungary. Geyza was a heathen, and in the beginning of his reign always treated the Christians with toleration, allowing free admission into his duchy, and the end he, his wife, and household converted. Their son Stephen was born 977, and at the age of twelve was baptised. Adalbert, Bishop of Prague. Geyza died 997, and Stephen became duke. He used first to improve the morals of his subjects, which by long indifference had fallen into a very low state. In order to have time to devote to the internal affairs of his kingdom, he made peace with all the surrounding powers. The Pagan party, however, rose in rebellion, and as he considered it his duty to extend the Christian religion, rather than to attend to reasons of state, he refused to listen to the compromise the opposition proposed—that they be allowed the free exercise of their ancient worship. They then took up arms, and Stephen and his troops completely defeated them, and, as a thanksgiving, founded a monastery, which was dedicated to St. Martin. He built colleges and churches throughout the duchy, and for the better organisation of ecclesiastical matters, he divided the country into ten bishoprics. He sent a Benedictine abbot, to Rome, to obtain the consent of the Pope, Sylvester II., to assume the title and dignity of king, and that thereby his influence for good might be increased. Some of the neighbouring dukes declared that he had taken this title from ambition, and they were resolved to humble his pride. Stephen defeated them, and took the leader, the Prince of Transylvania, prisoner, but soon released him, on condition that he would cause all the idols in his country to be demolished, and allow Christianity to be freely taught in his dominions. He drew up a code of laws, which form the groundwork of the Constitution of Hungary to this day. Stephen died Aug. 15th, 1038. Innocent XI. canonised him in 1687.

Stephen, Sr., Pope and martyr.—St. Stephen was a deacon, a native of Rome, and on the death of Lucius, in 253, was made Pope. When he had been Pope three years, he had a long and learned dispute with St. Cyprian on the question of baptism—whether it could be administered by heretics or not. They could not agree, so St. Cyprian called together two councils, both of which agreed that there could be no valid baptism, except that which is administered by the Church. St. Cyprian was supported by other African bishops, but Stephen refused to yield, and proceeded to excommunicate them. He did not live to see the contest end, as it afterwards did, in his favour, as the majority of the Eastern and African bishops retracted their decrees. He was martyred in the year 275, under the Emperor Valerian. August 2nd is kept in his memory.

Stephen's (St.) Day.—The death of the first Christian martyr is commemorated on Dec. 26th. Very little is known of his history and life, a few words in the Acts of the Apostles preceding the account of his martyrdom being all that is recorded of him. It says there that he was one of the first deacons, and excited the wrath of the Jews by telling the people that the law and the old dispensation had passed away, and that a new one was beginning. Tradition says that he had been brought up in the Jewish faith in Greece, and his name, Stephen, which means a "crown," is evidently Greek. The custom of keeping this day and those of St. John the Baptist and the Holy Innocents on the three days immediately after Christmas Day is very ancient, and many explanations have been given to account for the arrangement. Most commentators agree now that it was so arranged without any special design; others say that it was to draw attention to the three special graces of self-sacrifice, love, and purity.

Stephen the Sabaita.—One of the earliest hymn-writers of the Greek Church [b. 725, d. 794]. He was the nephew of St. John Damascene, who placed him in the Monastery of St. Sabas, where he remained for fifty-nine years. He is the author of the hymn translated, Art thou weary, &c.

Sternhold and Hopkins, authors of the old Metrical Versions of the Psalms.—

of Separation; Origines Britannice, or the Antiquities of the British Churches (1685); A Discourse concerning the Illegality of the Ecclesiastical Commission, in answer to the Vindication and Defence of it (1689); a Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, etc.

Stipendiary Curate. [PERPETUAL CURATE.]

Stoics.—A sect of Greek philosophers, who derived their name from the stoa, or colonnade, in which their leader, Zeno, lectured at Athens, about 306 a.c. The doctrines of Zeno, it is thought, may have been derived partly from the Jewish Scriptures, but it is certain that Socrates and Plato had taught much of them before, and Stoicism came nearest in morality to Christianity, for which it prepared the way. The Stoics maintained that nature (which in reality they identified with God) impels man to do that which is good; and that conformity to the laws of nature constitutes virtue. Every one who has a right discernment of what is good, desires to follow the will of Nature in all his desires and pursuits; and beyond this he must have no desires, but be independent of all surrounding circumstances. All external things are indifferent, and incapable of affecting the happiness of man, pain, which has nothing to do with the mind, is not evil, and a wise man will be happy in the midst of torture, because virtue itself is happiness. Stoicism gained a firm hold on the mind of the Romans, chiefly through its fundamental principle that action is far superior to meditation or to enjoyment; and it was expounded in Rome by Seneca, and by the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, and Epictetus the slave. Such was Stoicism in theory, and such were the best of its teachers, but practically the Stoics lived pretty much as they felt inclined to live, without any very strict reference to their philosophy about virtue, and their theory about endurance of suffering often led them to suicide as the easiest way of escaping it; of which Zeno himself, as well as Cato, are notable examples.

to represent the yoke of Christ, which is worn behind the neck and hanging down in front, with two ends. It is either black or coloured—when the latter, the colours of the different seasons are worn, according to the use of the Church. In the case of a deacon it is sometimes worn across the breast and tied under the right arm. It is one of the oldest Christian vestments used by the clergy.

Strauss, David Friedrich, the leader in our century of the extreme rationalists on the subject of the Life of Christ [b. at Ludwigsburg, in Wurtemberg, 1808. d. there, 1874], studied theology at Blaubeuren, and afterwards at Tubingen. He went to the seminary at Maulbronn as professor's assistant in 1830, and was at first a follower of Schelling and Boehme, but at Berlin, where he next went to study, his early opinions were exchanged for the philosophy of Hegel and the theology of Schleiermacher. He became under-teacher at the seminary at Tubingen, but forfeited this post through the publication of Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeit., in which he maintained that the Gospel history is a collection of myths, written in the first and second centuries of the Christian era, and founded on the Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah. Strauss was next appointed teacher in the Lyceum at Ludwigsburg, and in 1839 was chosen by the Council of Education to fill the office of Professor of Divinity and Church History at Zurich, but the appointment met with so much opposition from the people that he was dismissed with a small pension. He published Zwei Friedliche Blätter, Charakteristiken und Kritiken, and Die Christliche Glaubenslehre, in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampfe mit der modernen Wissenschaft, between 1838 and 1841, and raised thereby a controversy in which Neander, Tholuck, and others wrote in refutation of his doctrines. In 1847 he published Der Romantiker auf dem Throne der Cæsaren, oder Julian der Abtrünnige, a political satire, in which he gave great offence by comparing the Roman Emperor to Friedrich Wilhelm IV of Prussia. In 1848 he was elected a member of the Wurtemberg Diet for Ludwigsburg, but disappointed his constituents by taking the side of the Conservatives, and soon after resigned. Strauss's later works were Die Halben und die Ganzen, Der Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte, and Der alte und der neue Glaube; in these he retracted his former reverence for Christianity, denied the possibility of personal religion or belief in any god but the universe, which is "the development from a blind force or law, without any foreseen end," and expressed the opinion that there is no life hereafter. The hopelessness of such a creed made itself evident, and even rationalists recoiled from it. The theories of Strauss find but little acceptance, and have been successfully rebutted by both English and German critics. One of the finest works in antagonism is Professor Milligan's Treatise on the Resurrection.

Strigolniki.—A sect of Judaist Christians which sprang up in Russia in the fourteenth century and spread with some rapidity. A few even of the bishops favoured them for a while. At a later period they were severely repressed, but still exist under the name of Seleznevtchins. These observe circumcision and the Seventh-day Sabbath, and portions of the Mosaic Law.

Strype, Rev. John, Church historian, was born in London, 1643; died, 1737. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and afterwards at Jesus College, Cambridge. He removed to Catherine Hall, where he took his B.A. in 1665. In 1669 he was made M.A., and ordained to the curacy of Theydon Bois in Essex. A few months after he removed to Low Leyton, and there he stayed till within a few years of his death; he also held the lectureship of Hackney and the sinecure of Tarring, given him by Archbishop Tenison. He spent his later years at Hackney with a married granddaughter, and died at her house at the age of ninety-four. Strype published nothing till after he was fifty; it is therefore probable that he spent his life up to that time in collecting the immense amount of information and curious detail which we find in his books. He was by no means a brilliant writer—in fact, his books at times are tedious to the last degree. They consist for the most part of transcriptions of curious and valuable papers, which he brought to light for the first time; but he makes no attempt at commenting on them, and does not seem to have had the gift of knowing what was worth preserving and what not. The chief of them are: Memorials of the most Renowned Father in God, Thomas Cranmer, sometime Archbishop of Canterbury; The Life of the Learned Sir Thomas Smith, principal Secretary of State to Edward VI. and Elizabeth, wherein are discovered many singular matters relating to the state of learning, the reformation of religion, and the transactions of the kingdom during this time. His most important work, published in 1721, was Ecclesiastical Memorials, relating chiefly to religion and the reformation of it, and the emergencies of the Church of England under Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Queen Mary. He wrote the lives of all the most celebrated divines of the Reformation time, and published several sermons as well.

Stuart, Moses [b. at Wilton, Connecticut, 1780; d. at Andover, Massachusetts, 1852].—He showed marvellous precocity as a child, and at nineteen, while a student at Yale College, was appointed to deliver the salutatory oration, this being the highest honour that he could receive. He became a schoolmaster for a short time; studied law, and was called to the Bar in 1802; and after applying himself to the study of theology, was ordained in 1806, and made pastor of the first Congregational Church at Newhaven. In 1810 he was appointed Professor of Sacred Literature at the Theological Seminary at Andover; and though it was said that he had mistaken his vocation, and should have devoted himself to preaching, he proved as successful in his professorship as elsewhere. He composed a Hebrew grammar for the use of the and introduced the study of German into America. He held this post for eight years, during which time he published several Greek and Hebrew grammars, commentaries on some of St. Paul's Epistles, on the Apocalypse; Hints on the Interpretation of a Critical History and Defence of the present Canon, translations of Elements of Interpretation, and of Reading, and other works.

Sturm, St.—Among the many made by Boniface during his life in Germany, Sturm was one of the most important. He was born in Bavaria in 710, and he took the opportunity of a visit paid by bishop Boniface to their part of the country to ask him to undertake the education and bringing up of their boy. Boniface was then in a monastery at Fritzlar, and left Sturm until such time as he should be ready for ordination, which was in 740. He then assisted his master for three years, at the end of that time had an intention to found a monastery in some locality far away from any human habitation. Boniface hoped that by this means a desolate district might be turned into a cultivated and flourishing district, and readily gave his assistance. After many unsuccessful attempts Sturm found a suitable spot on the banks of the Fulda, at once returned to report his success to the bishop. The Archbishop received from him a grant of this land, and the monastery was begun under the direction of Sturm, who was soon ready for the reception of monks. Sturm was appointed abbot, but before he began his work he went to Italy to inspect the discipline and regulations of the religious houses there, in order that he might the better regulate his own. From its foundation Boniface exempted this monastery from any interference of reigning bishops, and ordered that the abbot should be considered responsible to the Pope alone. On the accession of Lullus to the archbishopric, however, he persuaded the Pope to disgrace Sturm, and deprive him of his office, thereby to get the government into his hands. Sturm was soon restored, and lived peaceably at Fulda till his death in 784.

Stylites. [SIMON STYLITES.]

Suarez, Francis.—A Spaniard and Jesuit [b. at Grenada in 1447; d. at 1517]. He entered the society at the age of seventeen, and became famous for his knowledge of divinity. He was professor successively at the colleges of Alcalá, Salamanca, and Rome. As he grew old he determined to live a quiet life, in order to devote himself entirely to literary works, of which, at his death, he had composed twenty-four volumes. His writings were mostly concerned with the questions of scholastic theology, and the philosophy of Aristotle.

Sub-Deacons.—The principal of the minor orders of the clergy in the early Church. They were ordained without imposition of hands. Their chief duties were to prepare the sacred vessels for the Eucharistic Service, and deliver them to the deacon at the proper time, and to attend at the doors of the church during the celebration of the Communion. They were also the bishop's messengers, employed by him to convey letters to foreign churches.

Sub-Delegate.—The assistant of a Judge-Delegate. The Sub-Delegate has the power of trying minor cases, though he cannot by law judge those of any importance; because, although he may be qualified, he is supposed not to have the experience necessary for such a responsibility.

Sublapsarians. [INFRA LAPSIANISM.]

Subscription, CLERICAL.—By Canon 36 of 1603, "No person was to be received into the ministry except he shall first subscribe to these articles following:—

"[1] That the King's majesty, under God, is the only supreme governor of the realm, and of all other his highness's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal, and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within his majesty's said realms, dominions, and countries.

"[2] That the Book of Common Prayer, and of ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons, containeth in it nothing contrary to the Word of God, and that it may lawfully be used, and that he himself will use the form in the said book prescribed in public prayer and administration of the Sacraments, and none other.

"[3] That he alloweth the book of Articles of Religion agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the convocation holden at London, in the year of our Lord God 1562, and that he acknowledgeth all and every the Articles therein contained, being in number nine-and-thirty, besides the ratification, to be agreeable to the Word of God."

Which subscription, as it seems by the same and the following Canon, must be before the bishop himself. "And, for the avoiding of all ambiguities, such person shall subscribe in the form and order of words, setting down both his Christian and surname, viz.:—

"I, N. N., do willingly and ex animo subscribe to these three Articles above-mentioned, and to all things that are contained in them."

"And if any bishop shall ordain any, except he shall first have so subscribed, he shall be suspended from giving of orders for the space of twelve months."

But by 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, ss. 4, 9, and 31 and 32 Vict., c. 72, the only oath now required to be taken is that of allegiance, which is as follows:—

"I, —, do swear that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God."

Between the passing of 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, and 31 and 32 Vict., c. 72, the oath to be taken was one of allegiance and supremacy contained in 21 and 22 Vict., c. 48, s. 1.

By s. 11 of 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, no oath is to be taken in the Ordination Service. In 1856 the Convocation of Canterbury passed a new Canon in conformity with this Act, and repealing the former Canon 36. The new Canon has, however, mutatis mutandis, the same provisions and penalties as the old one.

By 14 Car. II., c. 4, s. 13, "Every governor or head of every college and hall in the universities, and of the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton, within one month next after his election, or collation, and admission into the same government or headship, shall openly and publicly, in the church, chapel, or other public place, of the same college or hall, and in the presence of the Fellows and scholars of the same, or the greater part of them then resident, subscribe unto the Nine-and-thirty Articles of Religion mentioned in the statute of Eliz., c. 12, and unto the Book of Common Prayer, and declare his unfeigned assent and consent unto and approbation of the said Articles and of the same book, and to the use of all the prayers, rites and ceremonies, forms and orders in the said book prescribed and contained, according to this form following:—

"I, A. B., do declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by the book intituled The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the Use of the Church of England, together with the Psalters or Psalms of David, pointed as they are to be sung or said in churches; and the Form and Manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons."

And all such governors or heads of the said colleges and halls, or any of them, as shall be in holy orders, shall once at least in every quarter of the year (not having a lawful impediment) openly and publicly read the Morning Prayer and Service in and by the book appointed to be read, in the church, chapel, or other public place of the same college or hall, upon pain to lose and be suspended of and from all the benefits and profits belonging to the same government or headship, by the space of six months, by the Visitor or Visitors of the same college or hall; and if any governor or head of any college or hall suspended for not subscribing unto the said Articles and book, or for not reading of the Morning Prayer and Service as aforesaid, shall not at or before the end of six months made King's Chaplain, Bishop of Llandudno and Dean of St. Paul's in 1826, and Bishop of Winchester in 1828. The same John Bird Sumner was made Bishop of Exeter. When the controversy arose about Tracts for the Times the two brothers set themselves strongly to the opposite sides, and the Bishop of Winchester was regarded as the leader of the "Evangelical" party. In 1848, on the death of Archbishop Howley, Sumner was translated from Winchester to Exeter. He was not a learned man nor a powerful thinker, but he was everywhere respected as a man of deep personal piety, and those who knew him best loved him. One of the greatest flaws in his public life, that of his brother, was nepotism. The sons of both prelates were all provided with rich Church preferments, and both died wealthy. Archbishop Sumner's sentence in the GORHAM JUDGMENT [q.v.] drew upon him a bitter attack from the then Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Philpotts, who declared that he had betrayed the doctrines he was sworn to defend, and that he would never again hold communion with him. Both brothers set their faces against the revival of Convocation, but when at last the obstacles were removed, and Convocation resumed its sittings after more than a century of silence, they both joined very actively and usefully in its deliberations. Bishops in their time were reckoned as preachers, but only occasional sermons of theirs have been published. Archbishop Sumner's best published work was Apostolic Preaching considered in an Examination of St. Paul's Epistles [1815], which went through many editions. His Practical Exposition of the New Testament [9 vols.], though marked by much piety and gentleness of spirit, is of little value to the student. His brother, the Bishop of Winchester, held the See till 1869, when he resigned it, but lived till 1873—"last prince bishop," as he was styled, because of the bishops being thenceforth less than had been the case before the re-formation of the Ecclesiastical Commission.

Sabbath-day. [SABBATH.]

Sunday Schools, as a properly organised system, were founded in 1781 by ROBERT RAIKES [q.v.], a printer of Gloucester, who conceived the plan of collecting a few children from the streets on Sundays, and with the aid of volunteers instructing them in religious knowledge.

The improvement in the conduct and character of the children was so marked that in 1784 Raikes published an account of his success in the Gloucester Journal, of which he was the proprietor; it was reprinted in the London papers, and the subject attracted much attention. The example of Raikes was followed in several places, and in 1785 a society was formed for the establishment and maintenance of Sunday-schools in all parts of the kingdom, a large sum being expended in the payment of teachers. So great was the expense, that after Raikes's death many schools were closed for lack of funds, and hence originated the system of gratuitous instruction by teachers of a higher class than those who had been employed for the first schools. In 1803 the Sunday School Union [q.v. under SOCIETIES] was formed, to secure continuous instruction by unpaid teachers, and to publish books and tracts for the benefit of the cause. The first Sunday-schools united secular with religious instruction; but in later years the establishment of an organised system of week-day schools has removed the necessity of teaching reading and writing on Sundays. The Society of Friends have, however, retained the practice in their large Sunday morning schools, with great benefit as regards influence over the working classes above the age of childhood. [FRIENDS.] Sunday-schools were introduced into Scotland, Ireland, and America in the years immediately following their establishment in England; the Scottish Society for Promoting Religious Instruction among the Poor was formed in 1796, and the Irish Sunday School Society was founded in 1809, though a system of Sunday teaching had prevailed for some years previously. In later times they have become general in connection with all Protestant Churches on the Continent, and in England the Roman Catholics have established numerous Sunday-schools. In the year 1883 it was ascertained that since the census of 1851 the children in the Sunday-schools of the Church of England had increased about 138 per cent., of the Methodists 136 per cent., of the Baptists 129 per cent. (and Congregationalists probably about the same, but no returns were made up); of the Presbyterians 313 per cent. (owing to previous neglect in Scotland), and of the Society of Friends 720 per cent. It is believed that in the schools of the United Kingdom there were in 1885 about 650,000 teachers and 6,000,000 scholars.

Superalter [called also in the Roman Church Antimensium].—A portable altar which, having been consecrated, is put into a wooden frame. This name is wrongly applied to the re-table, a shelf put upon or behind the altar for the vases and cross.

Supererogation, Works of.—In the Roman Church, good works done beyond those which God absolutely requires for eternal salvation. The merit of all such works is gathered up, and may be given to those who have not done enough. This doctrine is defended by Matt. xix. 21, where, it is alleged, our Lord distinguishes between works necessary to eternal life, and works which make perfect. The Greek Church rejects this doctrine, and it is not mentioned in the Council of Trent, but is held by all Romanists. [INDULGENCES.]

e attributes of God are displayed in His works, we grant this too: but if the intention be intended to affirm that God has another view in creating men, so to say, than His own interests, we deny the intention, and affirm that God created men in His own happiness, and in order to have a people upon whom to bestow favours.

We desire to be informed, in the next place, how it can be conceived that a God who is able to damn millions of men can create them for the glory of God. We easily see that it is for the glory of Divine Wisdom to punish guilty men; but to resolve to create men without the consideration of their sin, so that they might sin, to create them that they should sin in order to their destruction, is what seems to us more to tarnish the glory of God than to preserve it.

sin, we demand how, according to this scheme, it can be conceived that God is the author of sin? In the general scheme of the Churches, God only permits men to sin; it is the abuse of liberty that plunges them into misery, even this principle, which as it seems, is yet subject to a great number of difficulties; but in this scheme, He permits sin to produce the end He proposed in creating the world, and it was necessary that men should sin: God created them for sin. If this be not to make God the author of sin, we must renounce the most distinct and obvious ideas.

sin, we require them to reconcile this with many express declarations of Scripture, which inform us that God would not have men to be saved. How doth it agree with such pressing entreaties, such cutting appeals, such tender expostulations, as God makes in regard to the unconverted? (xxiii. 37).

Lastly, we desire to know how is it possible to conceive a God who, being in the enjoyment of perfect happiness, incomprehensible and supreme, could determine to decree, though useless to His felicity, to condemn men without number for the purpose of confining them for ever in the chains of misery, and burning them for ever in the horrible flames?" [Gill's Body of Divinity, vol. i, p. 299.]

single. — A belt worn by some of the clergy to fasten the cassock round the waist.

sties. — A name used for Sponsors. We find it in the Prayer Book, both in the Matrimonial Service, "Forasmuch as this child is to be named by you, his sponsors, to renounce Satan and all his works," etc.; and in the Baptismal Service, "Because they promise them both to be true to the child baptised the benefit of baptism." — 32* of that spiritual instruction required by the Church, preparatory to the ratification of his baptismal vows at confirmation.

Surplice [derived from the Latin word superpellicium, "over-garment"]. — It is a white garment worn by the clergy since the twelfth century at all services of the Church; and later it has been used by any actually engaged in that service. The white garment is supposed to be the emblem of the light and purity of the Gospel. In the churches of Denmark and Sweden it is worn only for the celebration of the Communion.

Surreum Corda ["Lift up your hearts"]. — The exhortation of the priest to the people in the Eucharistic office, which is followed by the response, "We lift them up unto the Lord." It is the opening sentence of what is called "The Preface," a portion of the office which is found almost word for word in all the Liturgies which have come down to us.

Susanna, St. — St. Susanna is said to have been the niece of Pope Caius. The Emperor Diocletian wished her to marry his son, but she had made a vow of virginity, and refused to marry; so he ordered that she should be immediately executed. She is supposed to have suffered in the year 295. Her festival is August 11th. A famous church in Rome has borne her name since the fifth century, and gives a title to a cardinal-priest.

Suspension. — A clergyman, being judged guilty of any crime, is liable to suspension either of office or salary, according to the decision of the bishop. We find notices of the practice in the history of early Christian times, and it has lasted with various modifications to our own day.

Sutton, Christopher [b. in Hampshire in 1565, d. in 1629]. — He was educated first at Hart Hall, Oxford, and afterwards at Lincoln College, where he graduated in 1589. After holding several livings he was made Prebendary of Westminster, and afterwards of Lincoln. His chief works were: Disce Mori, Disce Vivere, and Godly Meditations upon the most Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Swabia, House of. [HOHENSTAUFEN.]

Sweden, Church of. — The date of the conversion of the Swedes to Christianity is uncertain, but probably it was about the year 830, through the preaching of Ansgar, a monk of Westphalia. At first his labours, and those of his followers, were attended with little success; but in the reign of Olaf Skotkonung, the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried and some monks came from England and converted the people, and Sweden became a Christian State in 1025. In the reign of Eric the Saint the first monasteries were founded [1150-60]. In 1163 the Archbishopric of Upsala was established. Still Paganism lingered in Sweden; in fact, the wedenborg's capacity, knowledge, and honesty, there can be no doubt: but ry of the year 1744, which was dis- so late as the year 1858 by Herr ing, royal librarian at Stockholm, no doubt in the minds of ordinary that in that year he suffered a deplor- ntal derangement, from which he never ed. This may account for his strange judgments; for Swedenborg classes nd St. Paul amongst the lost, while IIV. and George II. are amongst the ished angels! It is also noteworthy, ile he narrates visits of angels from known planets, there are none from and Neptune, then undiscovered.

enborg explained his peculiar views in of eight vols. 4to., Arcana Cœlestia, h he presses his doctrine of CORRE- NCES, a science which he says had ost since the time of Job till now l to him by a special revelation from rd. He says that there are certain harmony and correspondence existing i the natural and spiritual worlds, so atter and spirit are connected by an law, and wherever an analogy exists, be a predetermined "correspondence." s test he tries the authenticity of re, and rejects as uncanonical all those i which he fails to discern a spiritual In the Old Testament he only accepts nine books, and rejects the whole of v Testament but the four Gospels and ocalypse. When once the spiritual a word is ascertained by the spiritual application is uniform wherever it ur. Thus water is said to be the repre- e of truth; blood of Divine truth, etc.

The writings of Swedenborg are held by his followers to contain the true exposition of Scripture as revealed to him by a special illumination from the Lord.

Amongst his chief doctrines are that the Last Judgment has already taken place (in 1757), that the "New Jerusalem" has come in the form of the "New Church," and that the power and glory of Christ as shown in this New Church is spiritually His second coming. Of the Trinity he held and expressed views resembling those of Sabellius. He rejects the doctrine of justification by faith alone, and says, "To fear God and to work righteousness is to have charity; and whoever has charity, whatever his religious sentiments may be, will be saved." The resurrection is to be that of a spiritual body only, which will pass at first into a state of purgatory, where the good will be fitted for heaven, and the bad, having rejected all truth, will be utterly lost. His system is remarkable further for the prominence and permanence which it assigns to the relation of the sexes.

The last twenty-seven years of Swedenborg's life were spent in writing and publishing his books, which were mostly printed in Amsterdam. He does not seem to have anticipated the immediate formation of a separate Church, and therefore did not dis- sever himself from the Lutherans. He died in Great Bath Street, Coldbath Fields, on March 29th, 1772, and was buried in the Swedish Church in Ratcliffe Highway.

For the history of the sect of Swedenborgians after their founder's death see NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH.

Swithun, St., Bishop and patron saint of Winchester.—Very little is known of the early days of this saint, but that he was educated and brought up in the city of Winchester, of which See he afterwards became bishop. He was the chief adviser of King Egbert (the first King of all England), who so respected him for his learning and piety that he entrusted him with the education of his eldest son, Ethelwulf. On the death of Helmstan, Bishop of Winchester, in 852, Ethelwulf appointed Swithun, who was now prior of his monastery, to be his successor, and he was consecrated by Ceolnoth, Archbishop of Canterbury. He worked day and night for the good of his diocese, affecting great simplicity of life, even journeying about from place to place on foot. In 854, at a council held at Winchester, Swithun persuaded the King, in consequence of the increasing number of the clergy, the formation of new parishes and the building of new churches, to grant the tithes, or tenth part of his land throughout the country, to the Church, free from all taxation, and Ethelwulf took this charter himself to Rome for the approval and confirmation of the Pope.

Syn.—In the course of the history of the church, this term has had several significations.

At first it was the name given to two who shared a call with another. It became the custom for the bishop or the abbot of a monastery, or of the lower orders in constant communion with him day and night, and this was generally called the Synceillus. We may trace how the term got its original meaning—that of designating an ecclesiastical dignitary. Most probably at first they were merely what we should call assistants, but when it became the custom for them to exceed their masters, they kept their rank, and thus the highest dignitaries of the Greek Church, were called Syncelli. At one time there were many attached to the Church of Constantinople, but these were reduced to two. The rank of Synceillus was one of the highest in the church—they stood immediately below the taking precedence of the Metropolitans.

Syncretism.—The attempt to reconcile different views, particularly those relating to religion.

It is supposed to take its name from the island of Crete, the inhabitants of which, Plutarch, endeavoured to protect from attacks from without by intermingling themselves—though these were never respected in times of the time of the Reformation the parties of all countries were called to intermingle in opposing the Roman See, and hence became applied to those who sought to unite all minor differences in this the sixteenth century, when the ancient literature was revived in philosophy of Plato was more fashionable than that of Aristotle, but such as Francis Pico and Becon, though they admired Plato, were unwilling to give up entirely the study of Aristotle. They received the name of Syncretists in this case derived from a Greek word "to mix." The word again came into general use, particularly in Germany, during the seventeenth century. Pope Calixtus, professor of theology at Paris, advocated the union of all religions, but as the two great parties, the Lutherans and the Reformed, had been separated since the time of the Reformation, union between the two is regarded with horror by the deepest thinkers of the day. It may be understood that the term Syncretism, which united not only these different religious parties, was treated with contempt. From that time the name has been one of odium.

Synergists [Gr. synergese, "co-operation"].—A name given to some German divines of the sixteenth century, who held that the co-operation of man was needed in the work of renovation in addition to the grace of God. This was first stated by Melancthon in opposition to Luther, who in his De Servo Arbitrio [1524] strongly maintained justification by faith alone. But before his death his views became modified, and he had partially adopted the doctrine of free-will and of good works. These views were explained by Pfeffinger, Professor of Leipzig, who, with his followers, received the name of Synergists from Amadorff and others, who opposed them. In 1560 the "Synergistic controversy" was at its height, the leaders being Victorin Strigel, a pupil of Melancthon, and Matthias Flacius Illyricus, both of whom were professors at Jena. The discussion took place at Weimar. The Duke of Saxony favoured Strigel, but the latter refused to sign a paper drawn up by Flacius's party, and fled to Leipzig, refusing to return to Jena in spite of all overtures of friendship. Three disciples of Melancthon were called to Jena, but on the accession of a new duke in 1567 these were turned out, and Flacians took their place. Gradually the Synergists became absorbed in the Majorists. [MAJOR, GEORGE.]

Synesius, Bishop of Ptolemais, or Cyrene, born about 376, formerly a disciple of the celebrated Hypatia of Alexandria, and a believer in the Platonic philosophy. He became a convert to Christianity and was baptised. In 398 he was sent to Constantinople, and was ordained priest, and in 410 chosen Bishop of Ptolemais, and consecrated by Theophilus of Alexandria. He was very unwilling to accept the post, urging that he held some views which were not orthodox, and that he was married and did not wish to be separated from his wife, but his arguments were overruled, and his wife was allowed to live with him. The date of his death is not known, but it was probably about 414. His works were edited by Dionysius Petavius, at Paris, and contain 166 epistles, a treatise De Regno, etc.

Synod.—A synod is generally understood as being the same as a Council [q.v.], but Brande gives the following distinction, that a Council is a general assembly of the episcopal, provincial, or national order, while a synod is a convention of the inferior clergy of a diocese under its bishop or archdeacon.

Synodals.—This word is used in two senses:—[1] For the constitutions made in diocesan synods, which were formerly read in the churches on Sundays; [2] for a small payment reserved by the Bishop when he settled the revenues of a church upon the incumbent. This word must be derived from synod, and it is supposed that the custom of synodals originated in a duty paid by the clergy when attending synods.

ristian era. The whole civil constituted mode of thinking, as well as language Jews, had gradually undergone a convulsion, and were entirely different from what they were originally. The Mosaic books were no longer adapted to the state of the nation, and its new political state, connected with the change that had place in the religious views of the people led to many difficult questions, for no satisfactory solution could be found in the law. The Rabbis undertook to supply the defect, partly by commentaries on the precepts, and partly by the composition of new rules, which were looked upon as equally binding with the former. These comments were called the oral tradition in contradistinction to the old law or written code. This was the work of the Rabbis (or Jews, Hakkalosh, surnamed the "wise") who was the ornament of the school of the law, and is said to have occupied him many years. The commentaries and additions succeeding Rabbis made were collected by Rabbi Johanan ben Elazar about 230 under the name Gemara, the Chaldean or completion.

Mishna is divided into six parts:—(1) Eds or fruits; (2) Feasts; (3) Women; (4) Images; (5) Sacrifices and holy things; (6) Purifications. These are divided into three treatises, and these again into chapters. It contains traditions said to have been delivered to Moses during the time of his sojourn in the mount, which he afterwards communicated to Aaron, Eleazar, and his sons; by these they were transmitted to the seventy elders; by them to the people, who communicated them to the men of the great Sanhedrim, from whom the wise men of Jerusalem and Babylon received them. According to Dr. Prideaux, they passed from Isaiah to Baruch, from him to Ezra, and Ezra to the men of the Great Synagogue, 4 of whom was Simon the Just, who delivered them to Antigonus of Socho, and from him they came down in regular succession to Hillel, who took our Saviour in his arms; Hillel, at whose feet Paul was educated; next of all to Rabbi Judah, who committed them to writing in the Mishna. This Mishna and Gemara together formed the Jerusalem Talmud, relating chiefly to the Jews of Palestine, but after most of them had removed to Babylon, and the synagogues of Palestine had well-nigh disappeared, the Babylonian Rabbis, Aso and Abana, graciously composed new commentaries on the Mishna, which were completed about 500 A.D., and formed the Babylonian Talmud. This is the one most valued by the Jews. The judgment of it was made in the twelfth century by Maimonides, in which he rejects the greater absurdities with which the Gemara abounds. The latter is written in a somewhat coarse style, but the Mishna is much purer. The language of the Talmud is Aramaic or Chaldean, and is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. The Mishna was first printed at Naples, 1492, the Talmud of Jerusalem at Venice about 1523; the Babylonian Talmud, which is four times as large, at Venice about 1520. It has been translated into Latin, and is also published in most of the European languages.

Tanquelin or Tanchelm.—A native of the Netherlands who, in 1115, excited great commotion in Antwerp and drew after him a numerous sect. He is said to have proclaimed that he was God, and, though a layman, celebrated the Mass and held a public celebration in honour of his espousals with the Virgin Mary. He had imbibed the opinions and spirit of the Mystics; he treated with contempt the external worship of God, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper and the rite of baptism, and held clandestine assemblies to propagate more effectually his visionary notions. But besides this, he inveighed against the clergy, and declaimed against their vices with vehemence and intrepidity, and it is quite possible that the blasphemies attributed to him were false charges by a vindictive priesthood. He stayed some time in Utrecht, and then went to Antwerp, where he was slain by a priest in 1124 or 1125. His followers maintained his doctrines for some time after his death, but were brought back to the Church by St. Norbert. Mosheim seems to consider him rather as a mystic, and it is very possible that the other charges against him may have been grossly exaggerated by the Roman clergy, as in other cases.

Taoism or Taouism.—One of the three religions of China. Its founder, Lao-tse, lived, according to tradition, six hundred years before Christ. Tao is a word meaning "way," and so far as the mystical teaching can now be understood, it would seem that Tao represented the course which Lao-tse thought a man should pursue in order to overcome evil. The whole teaching was vague and unsatisfactory; but its followers made an advance on those that had preceded them, by believing firmly that ultimately good would gain the victory over evil. The head of the body was a sort of patriarch, who had the power of transmitting his dignity and office to a member of his own family, and the descendants of the first are said to have held the office for centuries. They attributed to their Tao, whom they regarded as the first being of the universe, various qualities, such as eternity and invisibility; but they do not seem to have regarded him as being in any way able to assist or comfort his followers. All they had to do was to contemplate him and his virtues—and to strive to keep in the Way. When Buddhism [q.v.] appeared, which offered something more tangible, both Taoism and Foism [q.v.] to a great extent disappeared, though some traces of the teaching of both are still to be found in Chinese theological books.

Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople [b. about the middle of the eighth century; d. 806].—He was of patrician birth, and was made Secretary of State during the reign of Constantine and Irene; the Empress favoured him because he practised image-worship, and upon the resignation of the Patriarch Paul in 784 she appointed Tarasius his successor. He was a layman, but a general council was called which agreed to recognise him as Patriarch, and to settle at the same time the disputes which had led to the resignation of his predecessor. A synodal letter was sent to Pope Adrian to urge him to accept Tarasius, and his consent being gained, a council was held, first at Constantinople in 785, and afterwards at Nicæa in 787, by which it was decreed that image-worship should be restored in the Greek Church.

Targum.—A name given to the Chaldee paraphrases of the books of the Old Testament. They are called paraphrases because they are rather comments than literal translations. During the Babylonish exile, Chaldee became more familiar to the Jews than Hebrew, so that when the Hebrew text was read in the synagogue, it was often followed by an exposition in Chaldee. It is probable that this was the case even in the time of Ezra, since, in reading the Law to the people in the Temple, he explained it to make it understood by the people [Neh. viii. 7-9]. Though the custom of making these explanations was a very ancient one with the Jews, they had no written Targums before the era of Onkelos and Jonathan, who lived about the time of our Saviour. Onkelos is said to have been the friend of the elder Gamaliel; his Targum is the most esteemed of all, and copies are to be found in which it is inserted verse for verse with the Hebrew; it is short and simple, and in style approaches nearly to the purity of the Chaldee as it is found in Ezra and in Daniel. It is a paraphrase of the Pentateuch only. There are two other Targums on the Pentateuch, one by Jonathan ben Uzziel, and the Targum Jerushalmi; but they are both recensions of that by Onkelos. Another Jonathan wrote a Targum on the greater and lesser prophets, and he is much more diffuse than Onkelos, running often into an allegorical style. The Targum of the Rabbi Joseph the Blind is upon the HAGIOGRAPHIA [q.v.]. He has written on the Psalms, Job, the Prophets, the Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther; his style is a corrupt Chaldee, with a mixture of words from foreign languages, and therefore his Targum is the least esteemed. The Targum Jerushalmi seems to be merely a fragment of some ancient paraphrase now lost; even the Pentateuch is not complete. The only Targum on Daniel is a Persian version supposed to belong to the twelfth century. These Targums were first printed at the close of the fifteenth century. They were published in Buxtorf's Hebrew Bible at Basle in 1610.

Tate, NAHUM [b. in Dublin, 1652; d. in London, 1715], a poet and dramatist. He became Poet-Laureate in 1690. He was improvident and intemperate, and took sanctuary as a debtor in the precincts of the Mint, at Southwark, where he died. We mention him here as the joint composer, with Dr. Nicholas Brady, of the Metrical Version of the Psalms, which till recently was bound up with the Common Prayer Book in place of the older version by Sternhold and Hopkins. The first twenty Psalms were published in 1695, and followed by a New Version of the Psalms of David, Fitted to the Times used in the Churches, by N. Tate and N. Brady [London, 1698].

Tatian.—A heresiarch of the second century, a Syrian and disciple of Justin Martyr. He was at first looked on as a man of eminent piety and great learning, which he used in the service of Christianity. But after the death of Justin he left Rome and returned to the East, where he opened a school in Mesopotamia; here he fell into the errors of the MARCIONITES and VALENTINIANS. He afterwards became the leader of the ENCRATITES. He wrote an apology for Christianity, entitled an Address to the Greeks, which is usually printed with Justin's works; and besides this he composed a harmony of the four Gospels, called DIATHESSARON [q.v.], from which he omitted the proofs of Christ's humanity.

Tauler, JOHN [b. 1290, d. 1361], a famous German mystical divine, was born and died at Strasburg. He entered the Dominican Order about 1308, and distinguished himself in the study of scholastic philosophy, and especially of mystical divinity: he was called the "Illuminated Divine." He studied for a time in Paris, and on his return to Strasburg took to preaching. He was possessed of great eloquence, and was esteemed one of the best preachers of his age; his sermons were written in Latin, but delivered in German. He harangued against the vices of the time with plainness and zeal, and thus incurred the displeasure of the monks. He did not spare the Pope, and though he had done good work amongst the sufferers whilst the Black Death was raging, his bishop forbade his preaching, and he had to remove to Cologne. Little more is known of his life: he returned to his native city to die. He was a man of great integrity and purity of life. The most celebrated of his devotional works is Nachfolge des armen Lebens Christi. His sermons have been translated into modern German, and some editions of them were printed in 1498 and 1580. His early sermons are more metaphysical, the later ones simpler.

and popular. Arndt wrote his life in 1689, and an account of his life and times was published in 1867 by Susannah Winkworth, with an interesting preface by Charles Kingsley.

Taylor, Isaac (b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, 1787, d. at Stamford Rivers, Essex, 1866).—An eminent lay religious essayist and controversialist, the son of an Independent minister of the same name, brother of Charles Taylor, who edited Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, and of Jane Taylor, the authoress of Hymns for Infant Minds and Contributions of Q. Q.

For a time Isaac Taylor followed his father's profession of engraver and artist, and he invented a machine for engraving illustrations and for printing patterns on calico from rollers. But he soon adopted a literary career, his first publication being a translation of Herodotus. Among his works are Natural History of Enthusiasm, Natural History of Fanaticism, and Spiritual Despotism, three popular and original works, History of the Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times, The Progress of Historical Proof; The Physical Theory of Another Life; The Restoration of Belief, etc. When the Tractarian Movement began at Oxford, he wrote a book to warn the unlearned against trusting too much to the practices and authority of the early Church; this he called Ancient Christianity and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times; it shows considerable learning and power of argument. In his later years he joined the Church of England, and at this period wrote a reply to Colenso, called Considerations on the Pentateuch; also Wesley and Methodism, Loyola and Jesuitism, many essays, reviews, etc., etc.

Taylor, Jeremy.—One of the greatest prelates in the Anglican Church, and perhaps its greatest preacher (b. at Cambridge, 1613; d. 1667). He was the son of a barber. His education was commenced at Perse's Grammar School at Cambridge, in his fourteenth year he entered Caius College as a sizar, and when little more than twenty years of age took his M.A., and was admitted to holy orders. He attracted the notice of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, before whom he preached at Lambeth, and by whose influence he obtained a Fellowship at All Souls', Oxford, in 1636. About the same time he was made Chaplain in Ordinary to the King, and in 1638 Juxon, Bishop of London, presented him to the rectory of Uppingham. Soon after he formed, together with Laud, the acquaintance of Francis à Sancta Clara, a learned Franciscan friar, and this exposed him to the accusation of being at heart attached to the Roman Church, a charge to which his love of splendid ceremonial and ascetic turn of mind lent plausibility; he, however, at a later period solemnly denied the truth of the assertion. Taylor's first notable publication, Episcopacy Asserted, gained for him a D.D. in 1643; during the next three years he accompanied the Royal army in the Civil Wars, but his living being sequestrated by the Parliament after the defeat of the Royalists, he retired to Newton in Carmarthenshire, where, with Wyatt of St. John's College (afterwards Prebendary of Lincoln) and Nicholson (afterwards Bishop of Gloucester), he opened a school. The Earl of Carbery, who lived in the same county, appointed Taylor his domestic chaplain. During the next thirteen years his greatest works appeared: in 1647 he published his Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying, with its just Limits and Temper; showing the unreasonableness of prescribing to other men's faith, and the iniquity of persecuting differing opinions; in 1650 the Life of Christ and The Rule and Exercise of Holy Living; in 1651 The Rule and Exercise of Holy Dying, some sermons, and the Discourse of the Divine Institution, Necessity and Sacrament of the Office Ministerial. In 1652 a Discourse on Baptism, its Institution and Efficacy upon all Believers; in 1653 some additional sermons; in 1654 The Real Presence and Spiritual of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament; in 1655 the Guide of Infant Devotion, or the Golden Grove, and the Unum Necessarium, or the Doctrine and Practice of Repentance; in 1657 a Collection of Political and Moral Discourses, etc., and in 1660 his famous Doctor Dubitantium, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures. He went to London for the purpose of publishing this last, and there signed the declaration of the Royalists on April 24th, and was thus brought under the favourable notice of Charles II., who at the close of the year made him Bishop of Down and Connor. He was consecrated in January, 1661, and a month later made a member of the Irish Privy Council, the following month the small See of Dromore was also entrusted to him, and before the end of the year he was elected Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dublin. Taylor was not happy in his preferments, which were attended by great and peculiar difficulties, owing to the revolution through which religion had passed. The Protestant or Episcopal religion was very unpopular in Ireland: the services were in English, which the native population could not understand, and though the bishop laboured zealously he met with little success. He was attacked by fever at Lashburn, and died on Aug. 13th, 1667, at the age of fifty-five. Jeremy Taylor has sometimes been called the modern Chrysostom, on account of his golden eloquence. The character of his mind fitted him to write with the greatest success on devotional subjects, and of this power Bishop Heber thus speaks:—"Whether he describes the duties, or dangers, or hopes of man, or the mercy, power, and justice of the Most High; whether he exhorts or instructs his brethren, or offers up his supplications in their behalf to the common Father of all, his conceptions and his expressions belong to the loftiest and sweetest moral hand of God, we believe that thou shalt," etc. And once more, all ancient MSS. have munerari, and not numerari, in verse 21, "Make them to be rewarded," etc. "The hymn contains," says Dean Comber, "first, an act of praise offered to God by us, and by all creatures, as well in earth as in heaven; secondly, a confession of faith; declaring [1] the general consent unto it, [2] the particulars of it, concerning every Person in the Trinity, and more largely concerning the Son, as to His divinity, His humanity, and particularly His incarnation, His death, His present glory, and His return to judgment; thirdly, a supplication grounded upon it: [1] for all His people, that they may be preserved here and hereafter; [2] for ourselves, who daily praise Him, that we may be kept from future sin, and be pardoned for what is past, because we trust in Him."

Teetotalism.—A teetotaler is a total abstainer from alcoholic drinks. The word tee-total is an emphasised form of total. It originated with Richard Turner, of Preston, who, at a temperance meeting in 1833, asserted that "nothing but the te-te-total will do."

Abstinence from strong drink, though with other objects than the promotion of temperance, dates from very early times. The Nazarite took a vow, either for a certain number of days or for life (as Samson and St. John the Baptist), to take no strong drink, and we have the Rechabites [Jer. xxxv. 6], as a tribe of hereditary teetotalers. But the Nazarite vow was essentially a sacrifice of the person to the Lord [Num. vi. 2], and in the case of the Rechabites was a sign of filial obedience. It was doubtless a protection, as well as a silent protest, against drunkenness, but these were not its primary objects, as they are with the various modern temperance societies. The Jewish sect of the Essenes also enjoined strict temperance in matters of drink. The Manichæan heretics of the third century rejected the use of wine, calling it "the gall of the Prince of Darkness," and earlier still the Ebionites and the Gnostic sect of the Encratites refused wine, and even communicated with water. In these cases wine was refused as a form of matter over which evil demons had special power. Later still, Mahomet absolutely forbade all intoxicating liquors to his followers.

Teetotalism originated at Preston, in Lancashire, chiefly—to their great honour—with a few working men. Seven persons signed the first total abstinence pledge, the name of Joseph Livesey being one of them, on Sept. 1st, 1832. Earlier pledges had allowed the use, in moderation, of wine and beer, spirits being always excluded, but from this time forwards teetotalism became the mark of all temperance societies.

The teetotal movement spread from Preston, and numerous other societies were formed, and in 1834 the British Temperance Association or League was founded. At the present time there are several large temperance societies based on total abstinence. One of the most important, the Church of England Temperance Society, had its origin in various parochial associations, and was formally originated in 1862, being accepted by Convocation, and sanctioned by the two Archbishops in 1873. It has the praiseworthy feature of a double platform, its "General" members, who only pledge themselves to promote temperance in all ways open to them, and its "Abstaining" members, who are pledged to total abstinence. The former section includes those who feel strongly on the subject of intemperance, but do not see their way to professing abstinence, whilst the latter section includes those who need the support of a solemn promise, and those who desire especially to influence others by their example. The pledge in this society is discharged on surrender of the card of membership.

It has been objected to teetotalers that they despise a good gift of God, and impose a needless vow, since every baptised person is pledged already to fight against "the world, the flesh, and the devil," in all forms, intemperance included. But it may be replied that to use the strong force of mutual association for the purpose of resisting this special temptation, is quite in accordance with the spirit of the Christian promise, and for the strong to deny themselves for the sake of the weak, is but to obey the spirit of St. Paul's injunction, "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves" [Rom. xiv. 21, xv. 1]. Those who know most of the horrors of drunkenness will be the first to overlook the teetotalers' errors of expression, and will be the readiest to give all the help they can to temperance associations until a great change has been brought about in the drinking habits of the working class, similar to that which has taken place in the habits of the classes above them—a change from widespread drunkenness to comparative sobriety.

One extreme into which many teetotalers have run is so serious as to require notice; the insistence upon some unfermented juice or syrup instead of wine at the Holy Communion. Although it may be conceded that the name wine was sometimes given anciently to a kind of unfermented grape jelly, or grape syrup, there is not the slightest reason for supposing that our Lord used anything but wine, i.e. the fermented juice of the grape, at the institution of the Eucharist, and such has been the practice of the Church ever since. It is therefore deplorable to bring discredit on the good cause of temperance by importing into it an error like that of the Manichæan sect of the Aquarians or Hydroparastatæ, who pretended to celebrate the Eucharist with water. The plea for this practice is that there are some reclaimed drunkards in whom the mere taste of wine rouses an uncontrollable desire for strong drink. It is surely possible, however, to select some natural wine which, diluted with water, will not recall the forbidden taste.

Telemachus.—A monk of the fifth century, who lived in the reign of Honorius and Arcadius. He left his convent to come to Rome, where one day, seeing some gladiators in the arena, he interfered to part them, and was stoned to death by the spectators, who took pleasure in that pastime. But his "works followed him," for in consequence of his murder the Emperor Honorius put a stop to the barbarous gladiatorial exhibitions.

Teleology [from the Gr. telos, "an end"] is the doctrine of ends, or the reasoning concerning the Divine purpose of all the created universe, and is applied to the argument from design in proof of the existence of God. Aristotle was the first to bring the word into philosophical discussion.

Tellier, MICHEL LE [1643–1719], a distinguished Jesuit, confessor to Louis XIV., and a bitter enemy of the Jansenists, was the chief promoter of the demolition of the celebrated house of Port Royal. He then forced upon the nation the bull UNIGENITUS [q.v.]. His violence was the cause of much of the odium which the Jesuits afterwards experienced, and paved the way for the abolition of their society.

Templars.—The first ecclesiastical order of knighthood; formed under Hugh de Payens at Jerusalem in 1119. They afterwards moved westwards, and lived chiefly in Paris. [MILITARY ORDERS.]

Temporalities.—In the office of institution to a parish it is said, "We authorise you to claim and enjoy all the accustomed temporalities appertaining to your cure," by which is meant the emoluments and property belonging to the church.

Ten Commandments.—The eighty-second Canon of the Church of England orders that "the Ten Commandments be set up on the east end of every church and chapel, where the people may best see and read the same." Queen Elizabeth in 1560 and 1561 ordered the displaying of the Commandments "at the east end of the chauncell," and they should be fixed "on the wall over the Communion board." In 1564, in the Book of Advertisements, it is ordered "to set the Tenne Commandments upon the easte walle over the said Table." At the present time there is a great variety of practice in this respect. Many churches are without them, the argument being used that, as every one possesses a Prayer Book and Bible, there is no longer the need which there was when these books were scarce to set them up publicly. But the defenders of the old practice reply that there is a true symbolism in the retention—namely, the declaration of Christian morals and Christian faith as the basis of the Church.

Tenison, THOMAS, Archbishop of Canterbury [b. at Cottenham in Cambridgeshire, 1636; d. at Lambeth, 1715].—He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and after taking his degree in 1657, he for a time studied medicine, but took orders in 1659, and after several other preferments, Charles II. presented him to the living of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. In 1689 William III. made him Archdeacon of London, and in 1691 Bishop of Lincoln, and on the death of Tillotson, in 1694, Archbishop of Canterbury. He did much for the diocese of Lincoln, which had been greatly neglected. While at St. Martin's he endowed a free school, and built and furnished a library. He is also regarded as the founder of the library in St. Paul's Cathedral. He bequeathed large sums for charitable objects, and is said to have been a pious and most exemplary man in every station that he filled.

Tenth. [TITHES.]

Terminism.—A doctrine which occasioned a controversy at Leipzig in the seventeenth century, the chief movers in which were Reichenberg, who upheld the doctrine; and Ittig, who denied it. It is the belief that there is a terminus in each man's life, which only occurs once, after which he is no longer capable of receiving grace or pardon for his sins.

Terrier [from the Latin terra, the list and particulars of all real property belonging to a benefice].—It is ordered by the eighty-seventh Canon that a written survey of all lands, houses, etc., belonging to any benefice, shall be taken and lodged in the bishop's registry, where it may be referred to at any time; it is, however, usual to keep a copy of this document in the parish chest also.

Tersanctus, Trisagion, or Seraphic Hymn.—The hymn in the Communion Service which begins "Therefore with angels and archangels," etc., where the word Sanctus or holy is thrice repeated. This anthem is of very early origin in the Church, Chrysostom and Cyril of Jerusalem mention it as used in the liturgy in the fourth century, but it was probably even earlier.* The translation of the original Greek form of the Trisagion is "O Holy God, O Holy Mighty One, O Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us." The preface to the hymn is recited by the priest alone, and then the choir and people join in the Sanctus. Originally it ended with the words "Hosanna in the highest, blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest," but in 1552 this was altered to its present form, "Glory be to Thee, O God."

Tersteegen, GERHARD, a German Pietist, with some tendency towards Mysticism, well known as the author of many German hymns, some of which are favourites in English. He was born Nov. 25, 1697, his parents being tradespeople, and made such progress in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, that his father was advised to devote him to study; but being unable to afford this, he was apprenticed to his brother-in-law, a merchant in Mulheim. Here, at sixteen years of age, he received his first religious impressions, which awakened so strong a desire for private meditation that at the close of his apprenticeship he learnt the more solitary business of ribbon-weaving, supporting himself thus with the greatest self-denial, until the pressing demand for his religious services induced him to accept the pecuniary assistance of a few select friends. All his life he suffered extremely from pain, illness, and extreme weakness, and his public exhortations and preaching were almost literally forced upon him. The spiritual power of his preaching was very great, the predominating doctrines of his teaching being the free grace of God in Christ, the experimental knowledge of Divine love in the soul, and practical unison with the will of God. He translated the works of Madame Guyon, and other French mystics, and published several original works. Many of his letters and some of his discourses (from notes taken down) have been preserved, and he wrote many hymns; of these the one beginning:

"Lo, God is here! let us adore, And own how awful is this place;"

and that commencing

"Thou hidden love of God, whose height And depth unfathomed no man knows," are translations by Wesley. He died in 1769. His life and various remains have been published in English.

Tertiaries.—The name given to those who observed the third rule of St. Francis, which was less rigorous than the others; it was for such as, without abandoning their worldly affairs, or resigning their possessions, were nevertheless disposed to enter with certain restrictions into the Franciscan Order, and desirous of enjoying the privileges that were annexed to it. This rule prescribed fasting, continence, hours of devotion and prayer, mean and dirty apparel, gravity of manners, but it neither prohibited contracting marriage, accumulating wealth, filling civil employments, nor attending to worldly affairs. They were sometimes called Friars of the penance of Christ, and also Brethren of the Sack. Many other Orders besides the Franciscans had afterwards their Tertiaries, as the Fraticelli, the Dominicans, the Carmelites, and the Augustinians. In France and Italy the Tertiaries are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers under the names of Beghards and Beguins, also Bizochi and Bocasoti.

Tertullian, QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENS, was the first of the ecclesiastical writers who wrote in Latin, and is therefore called by Milman "the father of Latin Christianity." He lived at the end of the second and beginning of the third century, under the Emperors Severus and Caracalla. The son of a centurion, he was born at Carthage, and brought up in the religion of his heathen parents, but was afterwards converted to Christianity, and became a priest at Carthage or Rome. It is known that he was married, from the fact that he addressed certain books to his wife; and it is hence inferred that the celibacy of the clergy was not yet customary. In middle age he joined the sect of Montanus, the asceticism and rigorous discipline of the Montanists being probably peculiarly attractive to a man of his austere character and vehement temper. Of his after life nothing certain is known, but it is said that he lived to a venerable age.

Tertullian was a voluminous author. His style is harsh, but vigorous and powerful. He seems to have been educated for the law (though he is not to be confounded with a namesake who was a jurisconsult about this time), and the effect of his training is apparent in his works. He treats Christianity, it has been said, as a client for whose defence he is retained; and does not scruple to make use of any argument. Some of his chief works are:—

1. His Apology, addressed to the governors of Proconsular Africa, under Severus. It contains a complaint that the mere name of Christian was made a test by judges; that Christians were not allowed to state their opinions; that they were frequently confounded with the Jews; and that ignorance and prejudice were the cause of the feeling against them. It also shows that Christians could not be suspected of disaffection, as they never attempted to avenge their wrongs, but offered supplications for the Emperors, and readily paid their taxes.

2. On the Prescription of Heretics. Prescription is a legal term, signifying the exception taken by a man when an attempt was made to dispossess him of his property, that the case should not be heard, on the ground that he has been in undisturbed possession for a number of years. Tertullian's book is an application of this principle, maintaining that it is unnecessary to argue with heretics on the merits of the case, for they are excluded from a hearing on account of their novelty.

3. Five books against the heresy of Marcion.

4. On Baptism, showing the necessity of the sacrament, and refuting the opinion that faith alone is sufficient for salvation.

name fell into discredit, and similar opinions are now held under the term Theism. But as infidelity has, in the present day, become more open in its opposition to God, Theists have come to be ranged on the side of Belief, and the term now includes not only those holding the old Deistic opinions, but all who believe in a Personal God who is possessed of power, wisdom, and goodness; all, in short, who confess the God of Abraham. Indeed, Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans — as against Atheists of all kinds, as well Materialists as Pantheists — are properly called Theists. It follows from this that in using the word some further explanation is required as to the manner in which belief in God is held, since the man who believes in a special revelation and in miracles, and the man who believes in neither, may both be Theists.

The title has been adopted by the Rev. Charles Voysey, once a clergyman of the Church of England, who, having published in sermons and other works opinions which were held to deny the doctrine of the Trinity and other Articles of the Faith of the Church, was prosecuted by his diocesan in the Court of Arches, and sentenced to deprivation in 1871. He then began to hold religious services in London, and gathered a congregation around him who call themselves "the Theistic Church." Mr. Voysey, in his account of the movement, contends that the principles which he holds are found in the Hebrew Psalms and Prophets, and in less abundance in the devout words of Brahmins, Parsees, Greeks, Romans, in the Rig Veda and Zendavesta. He declares that it was necessary to take a distinctive title, since he desired not to be confounded with Materialists, Agnostics, Pantheists, Socialists. Why not, then, be classed with Unitarians? "Because," replied Mr. Voysey, "the majority of Unitarians, by their preaching and by their worship, put both the Bible and Jesus into what Theists regard as a false position, going so far as to use only the Bible for reading the Lessons, and naming the name of Christ very much, if not quite in the light of a mediator, and not unfrequently calling him "Master," "Lord," and "Saviour." It is a special feature of his Theism to hold no man, however distinguished, as good, and no book, however venerable, is valuable in the light of an authority or in the position of a unique supremacy. His adherents say that the practice which they condemn has been the most fruitful of evil and error, of superstition and idolatry, among all the mistakes made in matters of religion. The leading principles of Theism he states as follows:—

1. That it is the right and duty of every man to think for himself in matters of religion.

2. That there is no finality in religious beliefs; that higher and higher views of God and of His dealings are always possible: and therefore it is to be expected and wished that future generations will improve upon the creed now held by Theists.

3. That it is our duty to obtain the highest and purest truth discoverable; and when it is discovered to proclaim it honestly and courageously. In like manner to denounce all detected error.

4. That personal excellence of character is necessary to a right knowledge of the goodness of God. Religion is thus based upon morality, and not morality upon religion.

5. That Theism is not aggressive against persons, but only against erroneous opinions.

6. That Theism recognises the value of all moral and religious truth, wheresoever it may be found.

The beliefs of Theism may be thus briefly expressed:—

1. That there is one living and true God, and there is no other God beside Him.

2. That He is perfect in power, wisdom, and goodness, and therefore every one is safe in His everlasting care.

3. Therefore that none can ever perish, or remain eternally in suffering or in sin; but all shall reach at last a home of goodness and blessedness in Him.

4. That, as we have been created for this goodness, it is our wisdom and duty to be as good as we can, and to shun and to forsake all evil.

The Theistic Liturgy is taken from that of the Church of England, all which clashes with Theism being omitted. Thus, the maledictions in the Psalms are all left out. There is a service for "The Dedication and Benediction of Children," and new Services for Matrimony, and for Burial or Cremation. There are also Family Prayers appended, besides a collection of ninety-eight hymns. The Theists advocate the retention of the Establishment of the Church of England. Mr. Voysey estimates their numbers at about half a million, but this is very doubtful.

Theodicea [from Theos, "God;" and dikaioō, "I acknowledge as right," or "vindicate"].—A vindication of the Deity in respect of the organisation of the world, and the freedom of human will. The term theodicea is applied to a defence of Theism against Atheism, which Leibnitz first undertook on a broad scale, by publishing in French, in 1710, his Essai de Théodicée, respecting the goodness of God, the liberty of man, and the origin of the Bible. In this work he maintains the notion that God had chosen, among all possible worlds, the most perfect. This was called optimism, and gave rise to much discussion until the latter part of the eighteenth century. Voltaire attacks it in his Candide.

Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 690.—He was a Cilician monk, born at Tarsus, and made Archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalianus. His first concern was to improve the state of religion, and to make the government and discipline of the Church more regular and uniform; and his next business was to revive and encourage learning, and for this purpose he got together a considerable library of Greek and Latin authors. He was the first to enjoin the acquirement of Greek from candidates for the ministry. The churches in England at this time were engaged in the controversy regarding the keeping of Easter, and Theodore succeeded in getting them to agree churches to the orthodox Christians, making Gregory Nazianzen Archbishop. In 381 he called together the second General Council, at which 150 bishops were present: they confirmed the Nicene Creed, and published several edicts for the punishment of heretics. He exercised also a religious influence over the West after the overthrow of Maximus and the establishment of Valentinian II. In 389 he came to Rome to receive the honour of a triumph, and abolished whatever traces of idolatry remained there. One blot on his character was an act of cruel vengeance executed on the people of Thessalonica, who, in 390, had in a tumult killed Hotheric, the commander of the garrison, and dragged his dead body through the streets. This atrocious deed was reported to Theodosius in exaggerated colours by his minister Rufinus, whereupon he immediately gave orders for a terrible retribution. A body of his soldiers entered the town and murdered 7,000 of its inhabitants. This act he afterwards deeply regretted, and submitted to the sentence of his friend St. Ambrose of Milan, which required him to do penance for eight months, during which time he was not admitted to partake of the Eucharist. In 392 Valentinian was murdered in Gaul by Arbogastes, who chose the rhetorician Eugenius as Emperor, on condition that he would tolerate idolatry. Theodosius defeated him, and became sole Emperor, but early in 395 he died of dropsy in Milan. He was certainly a remarkable man, and his death was deplored alike by Christians and heathen. Under his rule Paganism may be said to have received its death-blow.

Theodotians.—A sect which arose in the third century. Theodotus, a tanner of Byzantium, apostatised during a Roman persecution [192], and afterwards, to palliate his guilt, said that Christ, though of eminent virtue and born of a virgin by the operation of the Holy Spirit, was only a man, and that therefore he had denied man, but not God. For this heresy he was excommunicated. One of his disciples, Theodotus, a banker, organised a sect of Theodotians in 210, which was attacked in a book called The Little Labyrinth. Theodotus himself held that Christ, though born a man, became God at His baptism, but some of his followers thought He never became so, and others not till after His Resurrection. Artemon, a few years later, began to preach the same doctrines as Theodotus, and his followers were called Artemonites. The followers of Theodotus the banker are called Melchisedekians, because he held that Melchisedek was not a man, but a heavenly power, unbegotten, superior to Christ in that he is mediator for angels, whereas Christ only intercedes for men.

Theodotion, an Ebionite of Ephesus, who lived about the end of the second century, was a disciple of Tatian, and follower of Marcion. He afterwards became a Jew, and translated the Old Testament into Greek in the reign of Commodus. Origen observes that this is a free translation, in which important things are added and others are omitted. His version of Daniel was substituted by the ancient Church for that in the Septuagint.

Theologia Germanica.—The name of a book written in the fourteenth century by an unknown German author, the arguments of which are based on the doctrine of mysticism. As a devotional book it was placed by Luther next to the Bible, excepting only the writings of St. Augustine. It was written at a time of the wildest confusion—the time of the Papal schism, when the Church itself was, outwardly at least, a mass of corruption, and when the whole of Europe was devastated by war, pestilence, and famine. At such a period its calmness of tone is the more remarkable, and proves the strength of the writer's convictions. His object is to answer the questions which he has himself put forward, of the nature of goodness and sin, and of the end and aim of religion. He answers that goodness is simple submission to, and oneness with, God's will, and sin is independence; therefore, goodness can only be reached by a complete denial of self, and by such entire surrender to the Spirit of God that a man has no power over himself, and as it were abandons his own existence, his own desires, and the good works which he has done, and lies passive in God's hands to be disposed of according as He wills.

Theology [Theos, "God;" and logos, "doctrine"], the doctrine which God has given concerning Himself, the science which treats of the existence and character of God, and the relations in which we stand to Him. The word "theology" was in use among the heathens, who applied it to the works of those who speculated on the nature and worship of the gods, and therefore Homer and Plato were both regarded as theologians. Eusebius and Varro (as quoted by Augustine in his De Civitate) distinguished the heathen theology into three sorts, the fabulous (that of the poet), the natural (that taught in the philosophical schools), and the political (that of the priests and common people). The two former were open to the will of the professors to alter as they pleased, but the last was settled by authority, and could not be altered without national consent. The Roman Law was very strict on this point [Ulpian, De Legibus]. The state theology of the heathens consisted in the solemn service of the gods, and in attendance on the oracles and divinations.

The word theology is not used in the Bible. Its nearest equivalent is found in such phrases as "the mysteries of God," "the form of sound words," "sound doctrine" [1 Cor. ii. 7;

must not be left undefended nor error unassailed. The establishment of sound principles of criticism will be the surest method of terminating theological warfare. Practical Theology has its way prepared by all the departments of theological science that we have named; it depends on them, and at the same time is the crown of them all. It exhibits the precepts of religion and the motives which should guide us. There are those who declare that this department alone of theology is of importance, that all else is mere trifling. Thus Pope writes:—

But the answer to this is that the mode of Faith was revealed by God in order that men might be guided by it to better living, and therefore it cannot be lightly regarded. An opposite error is that which reserves all its admiration for the mysteries of faith. Religion is barren when it is cherished merely as a system of abstract truth, and it is weakness and inefficiency itself when regarded merely as a system of injunctions and prohibitions. Though it is a system of doctrines, it uniformly contemplates practical results, while the rules depend for all their power on the doctrines upon which they are based. Casuistry is the part of practical theology which applies itself to cases of conscience, decides difficulties as to what a man may or may not do in the way of duty.

When we survey the history of Theology from the beginning of Christianity until now, we discern the following divisions:—

1. The Apostolic Period.—One distinctive feature of Christianity has been the consistency of individual peculiarities with the presence of the Spirit. The records of the Lord's life and character in the four Gospels exhibit this feature in a remarkable manner. Though attuned by one and the selfsame Spirit, the individuality of each writer is never lost. The genuineness of their narratives is attested by the fact, which grows upon us the more attentively we peruse them, that the declared object of the revelation sent from Heaven accorded altogether with the effect upon the first hearers. Each of the authors of the Epistles, too, possessed his distinctive peculiarities. The last of the Apostles died; the age of the Twelve Apostles was contemporaneous with that of the twelve Cæsars—the beginning of the Kingdom of Christ and of the ungodly Empire which it was to overthrow—and the first age of the Church Theology was closed.

2. The Apostolic Fathers.—This name is given to the writers who succeeded the Apostles and Evangelists. Five writers have usually been reckoned under this head: CLEMENT, Bishop of Rome; IGNATIUS, POLYCARP, BARNABAS, HERMAS. Accounts of them will be found under their respective names. The transition has been truly said to furnish a striking proof of Biblical inspiration. The men who succeeded the sacred writers were men of holiness and piety; most, if not all, were martyrs; yet no one who reads their writings can fail to see the marked inferiority to those of the New Testament.

3. The Apologists are the next class of Theologians: those writers who came forth to lay at the feet of princes their protest against the charges of insubordination and immorality which were hurled against the Christians. [APOLOGIES FOR CHRISTIANITY.] The last of the Apologists anterior to the Middle Ages was Salvian.

4. The Early Heresies must be reckoned as a class of theological writings, arising from a falsification of the doctrines of the Gospel by admixture, now of Jewish doctrines and precepts, now of Oriental. The chief of these were the Gnostics and Manichæans. The anti-Trinitarian heretics came somewhat later: Praxeas, Noetus, Sabellius. Thus, while Christian Theology was at first occupied in preserving the Faith from corruption through mingling with heathen fables, its subsequent aim was to reduce the inequalities attendant on the assumption by Christianity of its dogmatic form to the standard of Catholic Faith.

5. Largely instrumental in this great work was the famous Alexandrian School of Theology, which, with all its faults, furnishes a beautiful chapter of ecclesiastical history. The works of its first great teacher, Pantænus, are lost, but his fame was excelled by that of his successor, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, and still more by that of ORIGEN, the father of Christian philosophy. The first condition of Theology was plain, simple, inartificial. It might be summed up in the belief that there is one God, whose Son came from heaven to bring remission of sins. But it was impossible that the world should accept this simple faith without inquiring into the reasons and meanings of these doctrines, and Origen's philosophical acuteness did much towards the reduction to greater precision of many dogmas which had been hitherto unquestioned. Neander, in his estimate of Alexandrian divinity, while he deals out high praise and admiration, yet discovers in some of its signs of the cold, unsocial selfishness of the later Platonism, and a deficiency of the sense of the still adherent, inveterate sinfulness of man, and of his littleness and insignificance. Another serious defect was the habit, characteristic of the Platonic atmosphere of the Alexandrian lecture-rooms, of allegorising the Old Testament narrative, still their plain meaning was oftentimes lost sight of. But when it is remembered that the piety of these men, their self-devotion, their great learning, were the human means of producing that great school of which Athanasius, the father of Christian orthodoxy, was the great flower, theological treatise of the Reformed Church of England was Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity. It may be truly said to have set a stamp on the Church which will never be effaced. From his time the great doctrines of the all-sufficiency of Christ, and of freedom of access to Him, were fully impressed upon Anglican Divinity, while the respect for Patristic antiquity and precedent, and the absence of the unhistorical and subjective element, became also a marked feature of it. Then controversies arose about the ministerial commission and about forms, which unhappily became connected with the political struggle between the early Stuarts and their subjects. When the wars had ceased, and peace returned, those writers arose who are the greatest masters in Anglican theology. A connecting link between the old and the new schools were Overall, Hook, and Ussher; the last-named endowed with learning which has rarely, if ever, been surpassed; the second wonderful for his tender and pathetic eloquence. First among the great names of the seventeenth century are JEREMY TAYLOR, the "English Chrysostom," and ISAAC BARROW. Almost contemporary with these were the leaders of the Nonconformists, Owen, Baxter, Howe, Manton, and Bates. Connecting links between these good men and the leaders of the Church party were Leighton and Reynolds, who taught within the Church with all the warmth and unction of the best Nonconformists. The bad and good qualities of the Latitudinarians and Nonjurors lie on the surface. The comprehensive views of Tillotson and Burnet caused them to many to appear cold and vague; yet they were men of deep piety, and possessed with a strong sense of ministerial responsibility. Those who believe the Nonjurors mistaken in their views, cannot refuse love and admiration for their consistency and self-sacrifice. The eighteenth century was a barren time, as in Europe generally, so in England. Yet Wake, Secker, Wilson, and Butler, will never cease to be honoured names in English theology.

Wesley and Whitfield were hardly theologians, though filled with missionary zeal and of resistless eloquence. But the Tracts for the Times brought in a new school of theology, learned, pious, and earnest; perhaps we should rather say it revived the theology of the seventeenth century. It has been the prevalent Anglican school since; but almost contemporaneously with it arose the Broad School of Theology, as expounded by Maurice, Kingsley, and others, which has also had a profound influence. The Church of Christ has profited from the teaching of all; and perhaps the most modern movement, and the best hope of the future, is an earnest endeavour to ascertain and absorb the real truth taught by able men of the most diverse views. It is becoming felt that each school has had its mission and its share of truth, and there never probably was a time when the Catholic Faith in its essentials was upheld by a nobler array of writers in every branch of the Church, and in every school of thought.

Theophanes of Byzantium, Abbot and Confessor [b. about 758, d. 816], educated at the court of the Emperor Constantine Copronymus. He assisted in 787 at the Council of Nice. He built two monasteries in Mysia, one of which, at Ager, he governed himself, training his monks and living himself in the greatest austerity. In 814 the Emperor Leo the Armenian renewed the persecution against the Church, and attacked the use of images, of the worship of which Theophanes was a staunch supporter. Being unable to conciliate him, Leo caused him to be thrown into a dungeon for two years, and afterwards banished him to the island of Samothrace, where he died immediately after his arrival. He wrote a Chronographia, an account of the events between the reigns of Diocletian and Leo the Armenian.

Theophany, or Theophaneia.—Another name for the Epiphany.

Theo-philanthropists [Greek, Theos, "God;" philos, "friend;" and anthrōpos, "man": "friends of God and man"].—The title assumed by a religious society formed at Paris during the French Revolution. The object of its founders was to revive public religious ceremonies [which had altogether ceased during the Reign of Terror] without returning to those doctrines and rites of Christianity which were incompatible with the Deism which they professed. In 1796 five heads of families—Chemin, Mareau, Janes, Haüy, and Mandar—associated themselves, and in December held their first meeting at a house in the Rue St. Denis for the purposes of Divine worship and moral instruction, according to the dictates of natural religion. Their services consisted of moral discourses, singing, and prayer. One of their number was Revellière-Lépaux, a member of the Directory, who allowed them the use of the ten parish churches of Paris, which they fitted up and adorned with religious and moral inscriptions, an ancient altar, a basket of flowers as an offering to the Supreme Being, a pulpit, and allegorical paintings and banners. Their services were at first performed every tenth day, but afterwards every Sunday at noon; they had no peculiar spiritual order, but the officers of the society were an overseer, a president of the temple, a reader and an orator, who wore a long white robe over a blue dress, with a sash or girdle of various colours, but who had no privileges nor payment. Their dogmas consisted solely of a belief in the existence of God, and in the immortality of the soul; in fact, pure Deism and practical morality. They implored the pardon of sins from God, but Jesus Christ was looked Occultism as a science, we are enabled to find "dwelling in fire, air, earth, and water, sub-human orders of beings, some inimical, some favourable to man." By their means, the phenomena of Spiritualism are accounted for in a manner so superior to the supposed agency of departed friends or relatives, that although Theosophists and Spiritualists both believe in the reality of the spiritualistic phenomena, and the existence of the psychic force, they are here obliged to part company. But for this, modern Theosophy would apparently be only a form of Spiritualism, though its programme is a more ambitious one, since it "covers the whole range of natural phenomena, and everything that concerns mankind and its environments." Like it, Theosophy appears now as decidedly anti-Christian, and there is more or less of sheer charlatanism connected with it, very unpleasant exposures connected with a certain Madame Blavatsky having shown something of the methods by which the system is bolstered up and imposed upon ignorant dupes.

Therapeutes, or Worshippers, of whom Philo the Jew makes mention in his treatise concerning Contemplative Life, are by some supposed to be a branch of the Essenes, but this is not certain; they were undoubtedly Jews. Their sect arose at the close of the first century. They gave themselves up entirely to contemplation of the Deity, lived in solitary places, performing none of the duties of active life. They quitted their estates, relations, and country, and spent their time in prayer, and reading the Scriptures and the writings of their learned predecessors; they sang hymns in their religious worship. they met every Saturday, which they kept as a great holiday, they lived a life of frugality and discipline, at the end of their meal they had leavened bread and hyssop sprinkled with salt in honour of the shewbread of the Temple, the men and women were ranged in two divisions, and moved somewhat in the measure of a dance, in the morning they waited the rising of the sun, and with uplifted hands begged that God Almighty would send them a happy day, and after these devotions they went to their respective seminaries or cells, and spent their time in their customary speculations. This is Philo's account of them, and he evidently considered them to be Jews. Eusebius supposes them to be Christians, but their practices do not accord with this view. Others have thought them to be Egyptian monks. In fact, there is a great diversity of opinion as to the religion of the sect.

Theresa, Sr., a religious enthusiast, born at Avila in Spain, in 1515. At an early age the perusal of the Lives of the Saints inspired her with a desire for martyrdom; and she fled from her home to seek death at the hands of the Moors. Being brought back, she erected a hermitage in her father's garden for retirement and devotion, and became a professed Carmelite nun at twenty-one years of age. Being dissatisfied with the laxity of discipline amongst her Order, she undertook to restore its original severity, and established an Order which she called the Reformed Carmelites, who had their first convent at Avila in 1562. In 1568 she founded a monastery at Dorvello, where originated the Barefooted Carmelites, or Discalceati. At her death she left thirty monasteries—sixteen for women and fourteen for men, all founded by herself. She composed ten books either concerning her Order or on godly subjects. 1. Her Life, written by herself. 2. The Way to Perfection. 3. The Foundations. 4. The Manner of Visiting Nuns. These four, by order of Philip II. of Spain, were sent in manuscript to the library of the famous monastery of the Escorial. 5. The Mansion, or Castle of the Soul. 6. Divine Love. 7. Exclamation. 8. Spiritual Advice. 9. Preparations for Confession. 10. Additions to her Life. She died at Alba, October, 1582, and was canonised by Gregory XV. in 1622.

Thirlwall, Connor, D.D., Bishop of St. David's [b. 1797, d. 1875]. He was educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a Fellow. He was called to the Bar in 1825, but changed his profession and took orders in 1828, and became rector of Kirby Underdale, Yorkshire. He was for several years examiner for the classical tripos at Cambridge, and also classical examiner in the University of London. In 1840 he was appointed Bishop of St. David's, and resigned his See in 1874. His principal work was his History of Greece, published 1835-40, and he was with Archdeacon Hare joint translator of Niebuhr's Roman History. Whilst Oxford, under the guidance of Newman and his friends, was silently bringing forth that vigorous revival of ecclesiastical life and thought which soon became so potent, there existed more particularly at Cambridge a school of what might be called "the new learning," attracted by the brilliant light which German scholars were throwing over ancient history and literature, and not less by the broader human foundations on which they were seeking, with whatever errors, to base the life and truth of Christianity. Bishop Thirlwall and Archdeacon Hare were two of the principal actors in this movement, and Dr. Thirlwall brought to the notice of English theologians one of the more important German criticisms on the Gospel history, which he published in 1825—namely, Schleiermacher's Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, to which Thirlwall prefixed a very learned and valuable introduction reviewing the state of Critical Controversy up to that date. As a bishop, he was probably more of a controversialist and general divine than administrator of his See. His charges, dealing with some of the most important questions of the day—e.g. the Colenso case, the Roman controversy, etc.—were, unlike the productions of many of his brethren, not mere ephemeral productions, but contributions to the solution of the great problem which will hold a place of permanent value. He was an active member of the Committee for the Revision of the Old Testament. On the question of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, he stood alone among his episcopal brethren in voting for it. His Charges, Letters, and Sermons [3 vols.] were published after his death under the editorship of Dean Stanley.

Thirty-nine Articles. [ARTICLES OF RELIGION.]

Thirty Years' War.—A great religious war that raged from 1618–48, and was ended by the Peace of Westphalia. The cause was nominally religion, but in reality it was the ambition of the house of Austria. It began in Bohemia, where the intolerance of the Emperor (Ferdinand II.) produced a revolt, and the old animosities of the Hussite wars were all revived. Their cause was taken up by the Protestant princes, and soon all Central Europe was aflame. The war divided itself into three distinct periods. In the first Austria, under the famous General Wallenstein, was completely victorious, and threatened to subdue all Germany. In the second, owing to the military genius of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, who became their leader, the Protestants carried all before them; and in the third, victory was more uncertain and more equally divided. France took an active part on the Protestant side under Turenne and Condé. The great French Minister, Cardinal Richelieu, though he oppressed the Protestants in France, helped those of Germany, in pursuance of his policy of French rivalry of German greatness. The chief provisions of the Peace of Westphalia [1648] were:—

1. Austria lost Alsace, which became a possession of France, and also Lorraine, by which she had bought the help of the Elector of Saxony.

2. Sweden acquired Bremen, Verden, part of Pomerania, Stettin, Rügen, and Wismar, which made her a member of the German Federation.

3. Brandenburg obtained Magdeburg, Halberstadt, Minden, and Camin.

This was, therefore, to inflict a blow upon Germany which she had to wait until the present generation to recover. Not only were Alsace and other territories lost, but the right of France to the Lotharingian bishoprics was conceded; and Switzerland and the United Provinces, which had practically ceased for some time to belong to the Empire, were formally cut off. But the mischief to Germany was far greater than loss of territory. While France became united and compact as she pushed her boundaries to the Rhine, Germany was exhausted and prostrate through the long struggle for which she had formed the field. The authority of the Empire and the freedom of the people seemed to have perished together, and the once powerful unity was dissolved into a mere lax confederation of petty despotisms and oligarchies. The State of Brandenburg, which, as we have seen, received additions, began to lay the foundations of that monarchy which, under the name of Prussia, became, after a while, the leading State in the Confederation, and is now the all-absorbing power of the German Empire.

Tholuck, FRIEDRICH AUGUSTE, one of the greatest German divines of this century. was born at Breslau in 1799; died at Halle, 1877. He was of humble birth, and as a young man was apprenticed by his father to a jeweller in Silesia. He was, however, so thoroughly devoted to study and so anxious to be able to attend good classes, that some of his friends raised a subscription large enough to send him to a gymnasium in Berlin. He studied with great zeal day and night, and by so doing permanently ruined his eyesight. For many years he was a sceptic, and in his farewell speech before leaving college announced his conviction that Mohammedanism was a religion of equal dignity and beauty with Christianity. But just at this time he became acquainted with several good and learned men, amongst them Neander; and by their influence he was induced to study the Bible carefully, and was soon fully won over to the cause of Christianity. He has written several books describing the various conflicts that waged in his mind during this critical period of his life—Sin and Redemption, or the True Consecration of the Sceptic, and others. He lived chiefly in Berlin, superintending an orphan asylum which he had founded, and taking a special interest in young men studying for orders. This may be called his special work in life, for he had a peculiarly happy way of dealing with the doubts and difficulties of young men, and knew exactly how best to encourage them. But he also gave much time to the critical study of the Bible, and in 1826, on the death of Dr. Knapp, was appointed Professor of Dogmatics and Exegesis at the University of Halle. He was obliged to resign after a year on account of ill-health. He went to Rome for three years, and came back so far restored that he was able to undertake the professorship duties, and remained in the same post till his death. His chief commentaries are those on the Epistles to the Romans and Hebrews, Sermon on the Mount, the Gospel of St. John, and the Psalms. Another book which has been translated into most modern languages, is The Credibility of the Gospel History, a very able answer to Strauss's Leben Jesu.

Thomas, St., Christians of.—Origen us that Parthia was the province ed for the labours of the Apostle Thomas, after which Sophronius says reached to the Medes, Persians, and ians, and legend says that he met the Magi who brought gifts to the In-Saviour, and that they joined him in ling the Gospel. It is said that he d India, and travelled to Sumatra; and omost intimates his preaching in Ethiopia. Portuguese say that he came first to ra, in the Arabian Sea, and thence to ranor, where, having converted many, velled further into the East; and having usfully preached the Gospel, returned e Coromandel coast, where he built a h at Malabar, and converted the prince of untry, but the Brahmins, being hostile to ianity, had him put to death by running hrough with a lance while at his prayers. ranganor, now called St. Thomas, there body who call themselves CHRISTIANS . In 1546 John de uerque, a Franciscan, and first Arch- of Goa, erected a college at Cranganor e conversion of these Christians to the h of Rome; the Jesuits established er, and in 1599 the Archbishop Meneses ht them into some sort of connection Rome; but in 1653 most of the converts ed to their original faith.

ir liturgy is in the Syriac language. doctrines may be gathered from a letter hed in the Guardian in 1884, showing ifficulty of a proposed union of these ians with other Protestant bodies of ern India:—"One who is imbued with doctrine and discipline of primitive any would find that the difficulty of uniting these Syrians consists, not in their tion of deacons at the age of fourteen, their offering prayers for the departed, ignorance of theology on the part of the nars; but in the rejection, on the part s Church and its rulers, of the Fourth al Council. This is a real difficulty, though the Jacobites undoubtedly and gly hold that our Lord is Perfect God and t Man, yet they refuse to admit that two natures are united in the One of our Lord; they hold that in the nation, the Two Natures were so united become One Nature thereafter."

professor at Saumur. He was indefatigable in his studies, and wrote many books. In his youth he joined the Jansenists for a time, but afterwards made a public retraction, and wrote against them. His chief works are: Dissertations upon the Councils in Latin; Ancienne et Nouvelle Discipline de l'Église touchant les Bénéfices et les Bénéficiaires; various dogmatical tracts; a Method for Studying Philosophy, Profane History, and Poetry; a Universal Hebrew Glossary, etc.

Thomists.—The followers of THOMAS AQUINAS [q.v.]. They were called Thomists in opposition to the Scotists, or followers of Duns Scotus. The two sects were at variance as to the nature of the Divine co-operation with the human will, the measure of Divine grace that is necessary to salvation, the unity of form in man, or personal identity, and other abstruse and minute questions. The Thomists leaned in philosophy to NOMINALISM [q.v.], although they held the abstract form to be the essence of things; they followed the doctrines of Augustine as to grace, and disputed the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. They belonged mostly to the Dominican Order, while the Scotists were Franciscans.

Thoresby, John of, Archbishop of York. —He was brought up as a lawyer, and in 1341 became Master of the Rolls. In 1347 he was made Bishop of St. David's, whence he was promoted in 1349 to Worcester, and became Lord Chancellor of England. In 1352 he was translated to York. He found his diocese in by no means a satisfactory condition, and set to work to remedy the existing evils. The clergy as well as the people were grossly ignorant, and Thoresby drew up for them a catechism in Latin containing an exposition of the Ten Commandments and other essentials, which he had translated into English that they might be frequently read to the people. In his time the jealousies between Canterbury and York were settled. He died at Thorpe in 1373. He rebuilt the choir of his cathedral, and was buried in the Lady Chapel.

Thorn, THE CONFERENCE OF, was one of many assemblies, the object of which was to reconcile the various branches of the Christian Church. It was held in 1645 by the express order of Ladislaus IV., King of Poland, and the conference was between several eminent doctors of the Roman, Lutheran, and Reformed Churches; it was designed to heal the divisions which existed among them, and to find out some means of reconciling their differences, and bringing about reunion. It was called The Charitable Conference; it lasted for three months, but terminated without any results.

Thorn, William.—A Benedictine of St. Augustine's at Canterbury. He lived in the latter part of the fourteenth century, and sufferer was silent. And an error on such a subject is to be deprecated.

Three Kings, THE.—The Magi spoken of in the New Testament as offering gifts to Christ; this is celebrated in the Feast of Epiphany. [EPIPHANY.] They are called kings by the Catholic Church, and Cologne boasts of possessing their bones in her cathedral, where their monument is shown in a chapel built by the Elector Maximilian, whence they are styled "The Three Kings of Cologne." Legend relates that their names were Caspar, Melchior, and Balthazar; that they were baptised on their return to their own country, that 300 years afterwards their bodies were removed to Constantinople by the Empress Helena, thence by Eustathius to Milan, and lastly by Renatus to Cologne.

Throne.—The name applied to the special seat for an archbishop, or bishop, in his cathedral. It is usually placed in the choir and decorated with a canopy.

Thundering Legion. [LACON, THUNDERING.]

Thuribulum, or Thurible.—The censer in which incense is burned; it is usually a silver or gold vessel with perforations in its cover, through which the fumes rise; long chains are attached to it by which it is swung backwards and forwards by the acolyte.

Tiara.—A name given to the crown worn by the Pope; a kind of round high cap, encircled with three golden crowns, set with jewels in three rows one over the other, ending in a point that supports a globe with a cross over it. At first the papal crown was similar to that of an ordinary bishop, but Nicholas I., chosen Pope in 858, added a golden circle as a sign of his civil authority. Boniface VII. added a second about 1294, and Urban V. a third about 1365.

Tiberius Caesar.—Emperor of Rome next to Augustus, from A.D. 15 to 37. In the fifteenth year of his reign, John the Baptist commenced his ministry, and three years later our Blessed Lord was crucified, under the Roman Governor Pontius Pilate.

Tiburtius, St., a Christian martyr, was the son of Chromatius, who, according to several writers of that time, was Governor of Rome under Carinus, and his successor, Diocletian. Chromatius was converted to Christianity by St. Sebastian, and Tranquillin, the father of two brothers whom he had condemned to death. [See MARCUS and MARCELLIANUS.] Tiburtius was baptised immediately, but Chromatius waited for a season; then he resigned his offices in the State, and opened his house, which was at some distance from Rome, for the reception of those Christians who were in need of help. Tiburtius was, from the first, eager to suffer martyrdom for the sake of his religion, and therefore refused to leave the city. He was impeached to Fabian, who had succeeded Chromatius, and was told that he must either offer incense to idols, or walk barefoot over hot coals. Tradition says that he chose the latter, and escaped without the slightest injury. Fabian was so angry at seeing his victim escape that he ordered him to be executed immediately. He was beheaded in 286, and the 11th of August is kept in his memory.

Tide.—The Saxon word for hour, time, and sometimes for a festival, as Easter-tide, Whitsun-tide, etc.

Tierce.—One of the hours of prayer. [CANONICAL HOURS.]

Tillemont, LOUIS SEBASTIEN LE NAIN DE [born in Paris, 1637; died there 1698], was a celebrated ecclesiastical historian. He was educated at Port Royal, and ordained priest in 1676, on the persuasion of his friend and spiritual adviser, Le Maistre de Sacy. His whole time was devoted to the study of Church history, and holding that profane history should be interwoven with that of the Church, he first published, in 1690, a History of the Emperors, etc., and then followed it in 1694 by Notes to serve for an Ecclesiastical History of the first Six Centuries. The Mémoires are in sixteen volumes, the history in six. The history consists of the lives of saints, of famous men, of emperors, of the history of heresies, ranged under distinct titles, and interwoven with passages from the Fathers, and from more modern authors; he has subjoined critical notes at the end of each volume, which are remarkably exact and judicious. His works have been serviceable to many persons since who have published new editions of St. Cyprian, St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, etc.

Tillotson, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a clothier, and was born in Halifax in 1630. He was educated first in the Grammar School of his native town, and afterwards entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, as a pensioner. His parents were Puritans, firmly attached to the Independent party, and as this party was decidedly in the ascendant at Cambridge at the time Tillotson was there, it might appear likely that he would firmly adopt their opinions. He was attracted, however, by the writings of Chillingworth, and became one of the followers of his school, which taught a middle way between Catholicism on one side, and Calvinism on the other. The Low Churchmen of that day were sometimes called Latitudinarians, and Tillotson's sermons show that he adopted the teaching of that school. Before his ordination he was tutor in a family related in some way to Cromwell, and he afterwards married a niece of the Protector. The date and place of his bestowed. The adoption of tithes as a system was probably a transfer from the Roman system already referred to, harmonising as it did with the custom of the Jewish Church. Selden quotes passages from the ancient Fathers to prove that the Christian Church, even in the days of persecution, claimed tithes as due jure Divino, but there is no clear evidence how far this right was acknowledged until the establishment of Christianity as the national religion. Nor is it entirely clear whether the tithe paid under the Roman system was for a civil or religious purpose, but it appears probable that the Emperors laid claim to them as holding the office of Chief Pontifex. At the Synod of Cullen in 356 tithes are spoken of as "God's rents." Jerome and Augustine use the same language, and in the sixth century the Synod of Macon declared those who did not pay them excommunicate. Charlemagne established tithes all through his empire, even on the newly converted Saxons. As regards England, Coke [Litt. Tenures, lib. 1, c. 9.] declares that "it appeareth by the laws and ordinances of ancient kings, and especially of King Alfred, that the first kings of this realm had all the lands of England in demesne, and les grandes mannors and royalties they reserved to themselves, and with the remnant they for the defence of the realm enfeoffed the Barons of the Realm with such jurisdiction as the Court Baron now hath. And at this time, when all the lands of England were the king's demesnes, Ethelwolf, the son of that Egbert who brought the Heptarchy under one sole prince, conferred the tithes of all the kingdom upon the Church by his Royal Charter." Selden quotes many laws of the Saxon kings for the payment of tithes, as their gift, and among them the dictum of Ethelred, "Nemo auferat a Deo, quod ad Deum pertinet et prædecessores nostri concesserunt." Then the payment of tithes was for hundreds of years payable by custom, and recognised as a duty before Parliaments began. When land changed hands the charge was transferred with it, and as a matter of fact there is nowhere any Parliamentary State document decreeing the payment of tithes. The earliest statutes which mention them assume the obligation [1 Rich. II. cap. 14; 5 Henry IV. cap. 11; 27 Henry VIII. cap. 20]. The Acts which were passed were to make clear points which had become doubtful or obscure. According to the original idea of the Church establishment the whole bishopric was in a large sense The Parish, and the income of it was the common stock of the clergy of the diocese, and Selden maintains that before the Lateran Council under Innocent III. every man might have given his tithes to what church he would within his own diocese, or might pay them into the hands of the bishop to be distributed at his discretion. But with the development of the parochial system the tithes of each parish were allotted to its own particular minister, first by common consent, and afterwards by the law of the land. Nevertheless "arbitrary consecrations," as the power of choice was called, again came into use, and became common till the reign of John. This was largely owing to the intrigues of the regular clergy or monks, and will account for the number and richness of the monasteries founded at that period. But in process of years the income of the laborious parochial clergy being reduced to a pittance, Pope Innocent III. in 1200 issued a Decretal Epistle to the Archbishop of Canterbury, enjoining the payment of tithes to the parsons of the respective parishes in which each man dwelt.

The composite nature of English institutions partly accounts for the different kinds of tithes; some are secular, some ecclesiastical: there are lay tithes and clerical. The tithes allotted to the ministry are divided into: [1] Prædial, those arising from the fruits of the ground, as corn, hay, hemp, underwood, or of trees—apples, cherries. [2] Personal, those arising from the profits of labour and industry. [3] Mixed, such as arise from the beasts, such as cheese, wool, milk, fowls, etc. Prædial tithes again are divided into great—those of corn, hay, wood; and small—flax, etc., as well as the mixed tithe. No tithe is to be paid on such things as do not increase and renew year by year. The transfer to a layman of the revenues of a benefice with the obligation to provide for the spiritual duties was known as Impropriation, and according to Spellman the name is intended to indicate that such a transfer was an impropriety, and ought never to have been made. However, it often was made before the Reformation, as well as the kindred habit of Appropriation—i.e. the transfer of the benefice to a monastery or a hospital. On the suppression of the monasteries the rights belonging to them were freely transferred by the Crown to laymen, and hence to their heirs descend not only the right to tithes, but in many cases the entire property of rectories. The spiritual duties of such rectories are performed by a clergyman who is called a vicar, who receives the small tithes with the parsonage and glebe. Tithes are no longer, as formerly, paid in kind, but are commuted for a money payment.

Under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. cap. 71, commutation may be effected through the Tithes Commissioners either by a voluntary parochial agreement, or by a compulsory award. In the latter case the basis of commutation is the clear average value for seven years of the tithes of the parish.

Title.—A name importing the sphere of spiritual work to which a clergyman is ordained. From a very early time there has been a rule that bishops shall not ordain a person unless he has some definite work in the throne, and gave a check to the Jews ; the thirteenth, in 683, made thirteen canons against those who should plot against or despise the authority of the Sovereign ; the fourteenth, in 684, was against the Monothelites and Apollinarians ; the fifteenth, in 688, discussed the substance and nature of Christ ; the sixteenth, in 693, protested against idolatry and the licentiousness of priests ; the seventeenth, in 694, was against the Jews. The eighteenth, and last, was held in 701 : its decrees are lost. Other Synods of Toledo are mentioned down to 1473, but none of any importance.

Toleration.—The liberty allowed in countries which have an established religion, to persons holding other views or opinions, to teach publicly their own tenets, and to worship in the mode of their own choice, or not at all. Such liberty is so entirely taken for granted in the conditions under which we live, that it is difficult to realise how different was the state of things in former times. It is unfair to the Church of Rome to reckon intolerance as her special monopoly, though it may fairly be claimed for the Reformation that Toleration only became possible under it. It was no cruelty on the part of the authorities of the Church previously which led them to punish with fine, imprisonment, and death those who challenged the received doctrines. For as a State claims to itself the right to imprison thieves and hang murderers, so it was believed that there was a like duty to punish those who depraved morals and ruined the souls of men. A man who wilfully poisons a soul was as sinful as he who wilfully poisons a body. And the Church of Rome, holding itself to be infallible, and its doctrines to be necessary to salvation, proclaimed it her duty to visit with the heaviest penalties those who fell into heresy concerning the faith delivered to the Church. It also appears possible that the mode of execution by burning, so constantly adopted, had in it originally some idea of expiating, by burning on earth, sins which it was held deserved eternal torment of the same kind in a most literal sense. It does not, therefore, surprise us that some of the gentlest of men were uncompromising "persecutors ;" such men were St. Francis de Sales and Sir Thomas More. It was the disbelief with which men came to regard this claim to infallibility, which led them to deny the right of any man, or body of men, to be regarded as an authority over consciences. We can therefore do justice to men like St. Dominic, and some of the promoters of the Inquisition, whilst we thank God that their day of persecution is over.

But the rejection of Roman infallibility was by no means the signal for general toleration. When Henry VIII. destroyed the Pope's authority in England he took it to himself, continued the censorship of books, and extended it over not only theological but political writings. In Queen Elizabeth's reign the right of printing was confined to the few presses in London, Cambridge, and Oxford which held royal licences, and in 1637 a decree of the Star Chamber limited the number of printers in the whole country to twenty, and of type-founders to four, and the work of these was subject to the strictest supervision. The danger to life and liberty into which a dissenter from Roman doctrine ran in the days of Queen Mary was transferred to Roman Catholics themselves under Queen Elizabeth. Not only so, but the animosities which divided Protestant from Protestant were no better. Barnes, a Lutheran, who himself had been imprisoned for heresy, impeached Lambert for heresy concerning the Sacrament in the days of Henry VIII., and procured his burning, and no sect recognised any shadow of divisions from its own standards. While the Romanist regarded all outside his dominion as outcasts from grace, the Anglican could only extend the terms of salvation to those who took the Sacraments from the Apostolically ordained minister, Lutherans anathematised those who denied the Real Presence, Calvin burned the Unitarian Servetus, and the Unitarians were uncompromising against those who denied the inspiration of the Scriptures. When the Star Chamber was abolished in 1640 the right which it had exercised was claimed by the Parliament, which pursued the same policy by an ordinance for the regulation of printing. When the Westminster Assembly met in 1643, the Independents proposed that all sects should be tolerated, but the Presbyterians successfully opposed them, and the Westminster Confession [c. 23] asserts the duty of the magistrate to promote the true religion, and to restrain and punish heterodoxy. That the Independents themselves had not learned to practise the principles of religious freedom is evident from the history of their proceedings in New England. "From the Reformation to the Commonwealth," says Bishop Heber, "there is abundant proof that, much as every religious party in its turn had suffered from persecution, and loudly and bitterly as each had, in its own particular instance, complained of the severities exercised against its members, no party had yet been found to perceive the great wickedness of persecution in the abstract, or the moral unfitness of temporal punishment as an engine of religious controversy. Even the sects who were themselves under oppression exclaimed against their rulers, not as being persecutors at all, but as persecuting those who professed the truth ; and each sect as it obtained the power to wield the secular weapon, esteemed it also a duty as well as a privilege not to bear the sword in vain." The first home of religious liberty was Holland, where the keen discussions that went on opened the eyes of religious men to the were all written in that language. There was no need of such a gift, and certainly there is no evidence that the early missionaries ever received it. The second view is that the Tongues were for a sign, not for permanent use. They seem to have been not set speeches, but short outpourings of praise, "as the Spirit gave them utterance." The gift of speech is that which distinguishes man. Supernatural speech was therefore a pledge of a new life and power in men. It was a sign of gifts of utterance, of knowledge and spiritual insight, a pledge of the fulfilment of the Lord's promise that His Spirit would teach them without help of men. Though the tongues were not an entire fulfilment of that promise, they were a sign of it. If the Apostles could speak with other tongues, they might believe that they could speak with superhuman wisdom. Most of all, the tongues were used as a means of praising God [Acts ii. 11]. For this was the highest work God committed to the tongue [Ps. cviii. 1], and now when the Spirit had descended upon redeemed man, to this work it was first applied. This view of the matter is well set forth in the sermon by the late Rev. F. W. Robertson on the subject; and it is also apparent from the Epistle to the Corinthians that the gift was liable to excess, and when so indulged was likely to lead to injurious reflections. Paul, therefore, places the gift of tongues in a very secondary rank compared with that of intelligible "prophesying," and it is well to bear this distinction in mind. For the alleged modern revival of this gift, see IRVINGITES.

Tonsure [corona clericalis].—A shaved crown has been from very ancient date one of the specific distinctions of the clerics of the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches. The early Christian teachers, however, did not carry out the practice, in order to distinguish themselves from the heathen priests. It was not till the sixth century that the fashion of shaving the head, with many other peculiarities of the monks, was adopted by secular priests. A difference was then made between a shaved forehead, which was called tonsure of the Apostle Paul, and a shaved crown, called tonsure of the Apostle Peter; the former being customary with the Greeks, Britons, and Irish; the latter in the Roman Church and those countries under its influence. At a Council held in Toledo in 633 the latter mode was formally prescribed, and called corona clericalis; since then the Roman tonsure has remained common to the secular clergy and monks in the West of Europe, and furnishes a means to distinguish the higher from the lower clergy, as the extent of tonsure increases with the rank till the priesthood is reached. Most of the mendicant and cloistered orders allow only a narrow strip of hair to grow round the head, all above and below is shaved. The tonsure is a necessary preliminary to entering the clerical state, whether secular or religious; in the former case it is conferred by the bishop of the diocese, in the latter by the head of the religious house. It invests the receiver with all the privileges of a cleric.

Toplady, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE [b. in 1740 at Farnham in Surrey; d. in London, 1778].—He was educated first at Westminster and then at Dublin University. Very early in life he took up decided religious views, and wrote some sacred poetry. In 1762 he was ordained, and became Vicar of Broad Hembury in Devonshire in 1768, where most of his hymns were composed. He was practically a Calvinistic Methodist, and on this point got into hot controversy with John Wesley, in which he used very bitter and unbecoming language. He was a very weakly man, and under medical advice he removed to London in 1775; here he preached for three years in a private chapel with some success till his death. Most of his hymns were published whilst in London. He was the author of the well-known hymn, "Rock of Ages, cleft for me;" it was first published in 1776, in the Gospel Magazine, of which Toplady was at that time the editor. Another of his hymns is "Your harps, ye trembling saints, Down from the willows take." A complete edition of his verses was published by D. Sedgwick in 1860.

Torquemada, JUAN DE, a Spaniard [b. 1388, d. 1468].—He was present at the Council of Basel. He is the author of a book on The Conception of Mary the Mother of God. He was made a Cardinal in 1439.

Torquemada, THOMAS DE [b. 1420, d. 1498].—A Dominican who became famous by establishing the Inquisition in Spain in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. He was made Grand Inquisitor in 1483, an office he held for fifteen years. He was an extremely cruel man; it is said that during his tenure of office nearly 9,000 victims were burnt at the stake. He was instrumental in procuring the banishment of the Jews from Spain to the number of 100,000.

Tractarian Movement.—The name given to the religious revival which commenced in Oxford in 1833. Two influences were at work in causing it. One was the tendency to Rationalism brought about by the study of German theologians; the other, the perfunctory way in which the clergy performed their clerical duties. Pluralists abounded, and there was a general spirit of money-getting abroad amongst the clergy. The rubrics were not carried out; there was no daily service, except in the cathedrals; the Holy Communion was administered only at long intervals, and, altogether, Church life was at a very low ebb.

Tradition.—Something handed down from one generation to another. In the Church the term includes customs, forms, rites and ceremonies which have been transmitted by oral communication. The Jews say that, besides their written law contained in the Old Testament, Moses delivered an oral law which was conveyed from father to son, and at length embodied in the Talmud; the Roman Catholics hold particular doctrines, supposed to have descended in like manner from Apostolic times, and they quote in support of this 2 Thess. ii. 15 and 1 Cor. xi. 2, where the word ordinances might be more strictly translated traditions. The Thirty-fourth Article lays down the Church's opinion regarding traditions; it does not mean that we may vary our doctrines or adopt fresh ones as matters of faith, but by its "traditions and ceremonies" is obviously meant those customs which, though not actually named in the Scriptures, nor in the written law or rubrics of the Church, have by long-established use become settled facts. Among these we may mention the custom of bowing in the Creed at the name of Jesus, the postures customary in various church offices, the use of a doxology and collects after the sermon, the pouring of water on the head at baptism, the saying or singing of the Psalms, and other matters of long usage, which, though unwritten, are held to be obligatory as standing customs of the Church.

Traditors.—Those who, in time of persecution—notably under Diocletian—to avoid ries enveloped the doctrine of the migration of the soul in myths, represent Dionysos or Bacchus as the and leader of the soul. In these also belief in a pre-existence is to be dis- ed, for they distinguish souls who are from their ethereal or heavenly life to earth, to appear for the first time as from the souls in a state of penance were obliged to enter a human body a and third time, and also from those which voluntarily come to the earth curiosity, or delight in individuality. Greek poets and philosophers have given is forms to these myths. Pindar, the goorean, lets the soul return to bliss passing three unblemished lives on

Plato extends the period for the of souls to God to ten thousand years, g which time they inhabit the bodies en and animals. Among the Romans, and Virgil allude to this doctrine. Rabbis maintain that God created only tain number of Jewish souls, which ore constantly return to earth as long ws are to be found here, and that as a ce they sometimes have to inhabit ls, but that on the Day of Resurrection ill all be purified and revive in the of the just on the soil of the Promised

The sect of the Manichæans also con- d the transmigration of the soul as a ce, and this belief existed among the Druids and Scythians, and is still en- ed by the heathens of Eastern Asia, the sian tribes, the savages of America, and grocs. With the Hindoos it has led to eneration of certain animals, and the of eating their flesh, lest their bodies l be the abode of departed ancestors or s.

re are passages in the Apocrypha which te that there were holders of the doc- of Transmigration among the Jews, and hn ix. 2 it seems indicated in the les' question. [See Dean Plumptre's note at passage in the Bible for English s.] The doctrine has still advocates; Charles Kingsley hints it in his well- a book The Water Babies.

transubstantiation [Latin trans, "and substantia, "a substance"].—The a doctrine that in the Holy Eucharist ead and wine, by the act of consecra- become the Body and Blood of Christ. ord itself is scholastic, and came into the eleventh century during the Beren- controversy [BERENGARIANS], and was led by the leading Schoolmen, and itatively adopted at the Lateran Council Innocent III. in 1215. The decree

"The true Body and Blood of Christ rily contained in the Sacrament of the under the appearances of bread and wine, ead being transubstantiated into the Body and the wine into the Blood by Divine power." At the thirteenth session of the Council of Trent the doctrine was categorically reaffirmed. [TRENT.] But when we go back into an early period of mediæval times there is clear evidence that the doctrine was un- known. Thus a Canon, probably of the age of Theodore [668-689], speaks of the body of Christ as being present, not substantially but spiritually; the Council of Celcyth, A.D. 816, speaks of the elements as inferior in sanctity to relics, and in the Homilies of Ælfric, written about 987, is the following passage: "Housel is Christ's body, not corporally but spiritually; not the body in which He suffered, but that body of which He spoke when He blessed bread and wine for housel."

The Roman Catholics do not deny that the term "Transubstantiation" is of mediæval origin, but they contend that the doctrine expressed thereby is implied in Holy Scrip- ture, and was held in the primitive Church. The cardinal passages on which they rely are the words of institution [Matt. xxvi. 26-28; Mark xiv. 22-24; Luke xxii. 19-20; 1 Cor. xi. 24-25], and the discourse in the synagogue of Capernaum [John vi. 26-71]. We may quote Milner's End of Controversy for an authoritative statement of their view:—

"Christ explained and promised this Divine mystery near one of the Paschs [John vi. 4], previous to His institution of it. He then multiplied five loaves and two fishes so as to afford a superabundant meal to five thousand men, besides women and children [Matt. xiv. 21], which was an evident sign of the future multiplication of His own person on the several altars of the world; after which He took occasion to speak of this mystery, by saying: 'I am the living bread, which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is My flesh, for the life of the world' [John vi. 51]. The Sacred Text goes on to inform us of the perplexity of the Jews from their understanding Christ's words in their plain and natural sense, which He, so far from removing by a different explanation, confirms by expressing that sense in other terms still more emphatical. 'The Jews, therefore, strove amongst themselves, saying, How can this man give us His flesh to eat? Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I said unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you. For My flesh is meat indeed, and My blood is drink indeed.' [Ver. 52, 53, 55.] Nor was it the multitude alone who took offence at this mystery of a real and corporal reception of Christ's person, so energetically and repeatedly expressed by Him, but also several of His own beloved disciples, whom certainly He would not have permitted to desert Him to their own destruction, if He could have removed their difficulty, by barely telling them that they were only to receive consent of the Fathers. Thus, then, this prince of the Fathers expounds the passage, and my readers will find it, I trust, instructive and interesting, notwithstanding that it is directly in the face of the carnal literal sense for which Dr. Milner contends.

"After quoting the words of the Saviour, Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood ye have no life in you, Augustine proceeds to say: 'His disciples were offended—not all, indeed, but the greater part—saying in themselves, This is a hard saying. Who can hear it? But when the Lord knew this in Himself, and heard the murmurs of their thoughts, He answered to the thinkers, who had not yet spoken, that they might know that they were heard, and might cease to think so. What, then, does He answer? Does this offend you? What and if you shall see the Son of Man ascending up where He was before? What doth He mean by the question, Doth this offend you? Do you think that I am about to divide this body which you behold into parts, and cut my members into pieces, and give them to you? What, therefore, and if you shall see the Son of Man ascending up where He was before? Certainly, He who could ascend entire could not be consumed. Therefore, He gave us the salutary refection of His body and blood, and resolved at once the great question of His integrity. Let those eat who eat, let those drink who drink, let them hunger and thirst; let them eat life, let them drink life. To eat, that is to be renewed; but you are so renewed that the source of your renewal may not be diminished. To drink this, what is it but to live? Eat life, drink life, you shall possess life, and that life is entire. Then the body and blood of Christ will be life to every one of you, IF THAT WHICH IS VISIBLY TAKEN IN THE SACRAMENT shall be SPIRITUALLY EATEN AND SPIRITUALLY DRUNK IN THE TRUTH ITSELF. ('Si quod in sacramento visibiliter sumitur in ipsa veritate spiritualiter manducetur spiritualiter bibatur.') FOR WE HAVE HEARD THE LORD HIMSELF SAYING, IT IS THE SPIRIT THAT QUICKENETH: THE FLESH PROFITETH NOTHING. THE WORDS WHICH I HAVE SPOKEN UNTO YOU ARE SPIRIT AND LIFE.' Here we see that Augustine applies the language of the Saviour to the Sacrament, so as perfectly to destroy the idea of Transubstantiation. The flesh profiteth nothing. It is the Spirit which quickeneth. And, therefore, that eating and drinking which is effectual is not corporal, but spiritual. But the following passage will show his meaning yet more clearly:—'If a preceptive speech,' saith this eminent Father, 'either forbids a crime or a sin, or orders something useful or beneficent, it is not figurative. But if it appears to order a crime or a sin, it is figurative. Unless you shall eat, saith our Lord, the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you. Here he seems to order a crime or an outrage, and, therefore, IT IS A FIGURE, DIRECTING THE COMMUNION OF OUR LORD'S

"Thus we see that the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel, instead of bearing the carnal and literal meaning which the modern Romanist puts upon it, was interpreted figuratively by the greatest light of the primitive Church in the fourth century. And the same result will be shown in reference to the next Scriptural proof which your author cites from the Gospels." [The passage from Milner is given above.]

"Now let us see how the Fathers interpret this; whether literally, with the modern Romanist, or figuratively and spiritually, with the Church of England. Thus saith the same great Augustine: 'If the Sacraments had not a certain similitude of those things of which they are the Sacraments, they could not be Sacraments at all. But from this similitude, for the most part, they take the names of the things themselves. Therefore, according to a certain mode, the Sacrament of Christ's Body is the Body of Christ, and the Sacrament of Christ's Blood is the Blood of Christ, and, in like manner, the Sacrament of Faith' (meaning Baptism) 'is Faith. Hence, the Apostle saith, speaking of Baptism, We are buried by Baptism into death. He does not say, We have set forth the Sign of Burial, but he saith We are buried. He calls the SACRAMENT of the thing BY THE WORD BELONGING TO THE THING ITSELF.'

"Augustine, elsewhere, applies this directly as follows: 'Our Lord,' saith he, 'did not hesitate to say, This is my body, when He gave them the sign of His body.' The same interpretation precisely was given to the language of our blessed Saviour by all the other primitive witnesses. Thus, Tertullian saith: 'The Lord, in the Gospel, showed bread, calling it His Body, in order that you might thence understand Him to have given to the bread THE FIGURE OF HIS BODY.' And again: 'Our Lord,' saith he, 'taking the bread, and distributing it to His disciples, made it His body by saying, This is My Body, that is, the figure of my body.' 'And that you may recognise an ancient figure of blood in wine,' continues Tertullian, 'Isaiah will teach you, saying, Who is this that cometh from Edom with dyed garments from Bozrah? I have trodden the winepress alone—and their blood is sprinkled upon my garments. And still more clearly in the Book of Genesis, where Jacob, in the blessing of Judah, delineates Christ: He washed His robe in wine, and His garment in the blood of the grape, indicating His flesh in the clothing, and His blood in the wine. Thus, now He consecrates His blood in wine, as then He figured wine for His blood.'

"Cyprian, the Bishop and Martyr of Carthage, gives us another plain proof of the same doctrine. It appears that some foolish innovators, in his days, had undertaken to

No extraneous learning, then, is demanded to perceive that the important truths primarily intended to be inculcated were these—that to hear and believe were the great requisites on the part of men; and that spiritual sustenance, even unto life eternal, would be the corresponding gift on the part of God. And thus, as far at least as the fifty-first verse, this discourse may be considered to be an amplification, by means of a constant allusion to ‘the bread of life,’ of what had been taught on another occasion: ‘Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life.’ [John v. 24.] All this is so clear, that, till we come to the fifty-first verse, Roman Catholics and Protestants, as Dr. Wiseman truly remarks, ‘are equally agreed’ that our Lord’s discourse ‘refers entirely to believing in Him.’ The truth is, that neither the hearers of that age nor the readers of the present can be deemed much more indebted, for their intelligence of the subject, to the above-mentioned expositions of the terms food and bread, than to the opinion in the Midrasch Cohemoth, previously referred to by Dr. Wiseman, that, ‘as [Moses] the first Goel [deliverer] brought down manna’—‘so likewise will [the Messiah] the second Goel cause manna to descend.’ In the art of interpreting, as well as in other arts, the time is at hand when it will be necessary to simplify our methods of proceeding very considerably.”

Dr. Turton adduces the judgment of an eminent Roman Catholic commentator, the annotator of the Rhenish New Testament, that the Jewish misconception was not what Milner and Wiseman make it, but far more gross and carnal.

“This carnality of theirs [the Jews] stood in two points especially: First, that they imagined that He would kill Himself, and cut and mangle His flesh into parts, and so give it them raw or roast to be eaten among them, ‘which could not be meant,’ saith St. Augustine, ‘for that had contained an heinous and barbarous fact; and therefore they might, and should, have been assured that He would command no such thing; but some other sweet sense to be of His hard, mystical, or figurative words; and to be fulfilled in a Sacrament, mystery, and a marvellous Divine sort, otherwise than they could comprehend. Secondly, they did err touching His flesh, in that they took it to be the flesh of a mere man, and of a dead man also, when it should come to be eaten.’ [From the note on John vi. 63.]”

The second dictum of the article, that Transubstantiation is “contrary to the plain words of Scripture,” would require a close examination of many passages of St. Paul’s Epistles, especially the Corinthians. We can only refer to Bishop Wordsworth’s learned commentary, which deals most fully with this subject, and may be taken as the latest expression of the Anglican view—the view held by a catena of the greatest divines from the Reformation downwards. On the two remaining points we will quote the weighty and pregnant comment of Bishop Beveridge:—

“The third thing is, that it ‘overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament,’ which I need not spend many words to prove; for in a Sacrament it is required, first, that there be some outward sign representing spiritual grace; whereas if the bread be really changed into the body of Christ there is no outward sign at all in the Sacrament, there being nothing else but the body and blood of Christ, which are not signs, but the thing signified. Nay, as Augustine observes, ‘The signs themselves are the Sacraments,’ and, therefore, where there is no sign there can be no Sacrament. And so, by depriving this sacred ordinance of its outward signs, they degrade it from being a Sacrament, making it to have nothing of the nature of a Sacrament in it. And, therefore, if they will still hold, that by the words of consecration the bread and wine are substantially changed into the body and blood of Christ, let them cease to call that holy action any longer a Sacrament, but name it ‘the body and blood of Christ;’ for, according to their opinion, there is nothing in it but the body and blood of Christ. So it is plain that by this doctrine the nature of a Sacrament in general must be destroyed, or this Sacrament in particular must be expunged out of their catalogue of Sacraments.

“The fourth and last thing here objected against the doctrine of Transubstantiation is, that ‘it hath given occasion to many superstitions,’ which any one that ever observed their customs and practices cannot but acknowledge. For this fond opinion possessing their brains, that the bread is the real body of Christ hung upon the cross, and pierced for their sins, oh! how zealous are they in wrapping it up neatly in their handkerchiefs, laying it up in their treasures, carrying it about in their processions; yea, and, at the length, in worshipping and adoring it too!”

On the Protestant teaching concerning the mystery of the Sacrament, see LORD’S SUPPER.

Trapp, JOHN [b. 1601, d. 1669], Rector of Weston-on-Avon, and author of a Commentary on the Bible, which has been recently reprinted and finds favour with the Evangelical clergy.

Trappe, LA.—An abbey of the Cistercian Order founded in 1140 by Rotrou, Count of Perche. As in many other such abbeys, the discipline became greatly relaxed, but it was reformed by the Abbot Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé. He was born in 1626 and ordained a priest in 1651, and in 1662 he determined on the reformation of his abbey, which he had already held in commendam for Stoke by the late Lord Ashburton, to whom he had become known at Alverstoke. In 1845 and 1846 Dr. Trench was Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge, and for a short time one of the Select Preachers. In 1841 he published his Notes on the Parables of Our Lord. When Dr. Wilberforce became Bishop of Oxford, he appointed Dr. Trench his Examining Chaplain; and a short time later he became Theological Professor and Examiner at King's College, London. This appointment he continued to hold until he was preferred to the Deanery of Westminster, on the death of Dr. Buckland, in 1856.

Upon the death of Dr. Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, in November, 1863, Dean Trench was appointed to the archiepiscopal See. He was consecrated on the 1st of January, 1864. The Archbishop speedily won golden opinions from all classes of society. He had not long held his high appointment, however, before he was called upon to take a prominent part in the agitation caused by the proposal to disestablish the Irish Church. After Mr. Gladstone had given notice of his resolutions in the House of Commons in the session of 1868, the Archbishop defined the policy of himself and his friends as follows:—"First, to fight for everything which we possess, as believing it rightfully ours; recognising, of course, the right of Parliament to redistribute within the Church its revenues, according to the changed necessities of the present time. If this battle is lost, then, totally rejecting the process of gradual starvation to which Disraeli would submit us, to go in for instant death at the hands of Gladstone." After the elections, which gave a great majority for Mr. Gladstone's policy, the Archbishop admitted that Establishment was hopelessly and irrevocably gone; but he pleaded for delay, hoping that Mr. Gladstone might be beaten on some of the important details of his scheme. Mr. Gladstone's measure became law, and in the controversies that ensued in connection with the reconstruction of the Irish Church, the Archbishop took that leading part which naturally devolved upon him as the result of his authority and position.

In consequence of ill-health, Dr. Trench resigned the Archbishopric in November, 1884. In notifying his resignation to the Synods of Dublin, Glendalough, and Kildare, which constituted the authority for the election of his successor, he stated that it was not his purpose to make any application to the representative body for the continuance of the income which he had received from them. During the reading of the Archbishop's letter of farewell, the members of the Synod remained standing, and there were cordial demonstrations of respect at its close. The news of the Archbishop's resignation was received with general regret throughout Ireland, and the cause of it elicited a widespread feeling of sympathy in England. He died March 28th, 1886.

Archbishop Trench's works occupy no inconsiderable place in English literature. His best-known theological works are his Notes on the Parables of our Lord, and Notes on the Miracles of our Lord; Lectures on Mediæval Church History; Lessons in Proverbs; The Sermon on the Mount illustrated from St. Augustine; St. Augustine as an Interpreter of Scripture; Synonyms of the New Testament; and The Epistles to the Seven Churches of Asia Minor. Further, Archbishop Trench was an ardent student of philology, and the work by which he is best known in literature is that entitled, On the Study of Words, consisting of five lectures addressed to the pupils of the Diocesan Training Schools, Winchester, and published in 1851. In 1855 appeared his English Past and Present, and two years later On some Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries. In 1858 Dr. Trench took up the question of the proposed revision of the Authorised Version of the new Testament; and, collaterally with this subject, it may be mentioned that some years afterwards he was selected as one of the editors of the New Commentary on the Bible, proposed by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Dean Trench was also appointed Chairman of the Literary and Historical Committee, intrusted, in conjunction with an Etymological Committee, by the Philological Society with the preparation and publication of a new English Dictionary.

Trent, COUNCIL OF.—Trent, the ancient Tridentum, is a town on the confines of the Tyrol, between Italy and Germany, and is celebrated as the place where the last General Council previous to that of the Vatican in 1869 (according to the Roman Church) was held. The reformation of the Church, which had been the object of the Councils of Constance and Basle, the policy of the Popes would not suffer to be carried into execution. There was a great desire on the part of many to have another General Council, but it had been long delayed, owing to the intrigues of the party who were most interested in retaining the abuses which were profitable to them, and especially hindered by the cardinals, and even by the Popes themselves. But to such a council only could Catholic Christendom look for the accomplishment of its most earnest wishes, and in the course of the German Reformation even the Protestant princes expressed their desire for such an assemblage of the clergy. The Emperor Charles V. urged it zealously; he found it a very effectual mode of alarming the Pope and curbing the Protestant princes, and thus controlling both parties, to persevere in demanding that a council should be convoked on German soil: so he solemnly announced a Council to the States at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530. In order to prevent

Emperor into security, as was soon evinced by the commencement of hostilities on the part of the Elector Maurice, who forced the Emperor to fly, and the members of the Council to disperse. They resolved accordingly, on April 8th, to adjourn for two years without even having commenced negotiations with the Protestants. Amidst these circumstances, the Treaty of Passau and the religious peace of Augsburg were concluded, and two Catholic princes, King Ferdinand and the Duke of Bavaria, ventured, in defiance of the Council, to grant to their Protestant subjects the privilege of the cup. In France the power of the Protestants was so great that they talked of summoning a national synod to settle their religious disputes, and so Pius IV., who had succeeded Paul, saw himself compelled, in 1560 and 1561, to re-assemble the General Council. It was re-opened Jan. 8th, 1562, by six Legates, under the presidency of the Cardinal Hercules Gonzaga of Mantua, with 112 bishops (mostly Italian), four abbots, and four generals of religious Orders. In the 18th session, Feb. 26th, a decree was published for preparing an index of prohibited books, but in the 19th and 20th it was again resolved to delay the publication of new decrees, this being the Roman policy to avoid opposition; for France, as well as the Emperor and Bavaria, reiterated their desire for the reformation of the Church, the administration in both kinds to the laity, the marriage of priests, and a revision of the laws concerning forbidden meats; and, besides, all the bishops, except those from Italy, agreed in the opinion, so odious to the Pope, that the episcopal power and rights were of Divine, and not Papal origin. In consequence of the number of Italian bishops they could always get a majority in favour of the Roman Court, so in the 21st and 22nd sessions, July 16th and Sept. 17th, 1562, they passed decrees respecting the celebration of the Lord's Supper and the Sacrifice of the Mass, allowing preparatory explanations in the vernacular languages; but the laity were referred to the Pope respecting their demand for the cup in the Lord's Supper. In these sessions there were present 230 prelates, besides the ambassadors of the Catholic Courts, and the number was increased on Nov. 13th by the arrival of the Cardinal of Lorraine with fourteen bishops, three abbots, and eighteen theologians from France, who not only gave new strength to the opposition, but also proposed thirty-four articles of reformation, which could not but be exceedingly offensive to the Papal party. This party, therefore, resorted again to delays, and postponed the next session from one month to another. Gonzaga, who was generally esteemed for his uprightness, but who was fettered in every step by the directions which he received from Rome, died on March 2nd, 1563, and in his place the new Legates, Moroni and Stavageri, presided, and so hindered work by empty formalities that both the Imperial and French Courts despaired either of getting any Church reformation or of making peace with the Protestants, who entirely rejected the Council. Moreover, the Cardinal of Lorraine was won over to the Papal party by bribery, and at length, either wearied by long delay or influenced by intrigue, the German, Spanish, and French bishops consented to a decree concerning the consecration of priests and the hierarchy entirely in accordance with the views of the Pope, which received public confirmation in eight canons in the 23rd session, July 15th, 1563. With equal pliability they suffered in the 24th session, Nov. 11th, a decree to be passed respecting the sacrament of matrimony, in twelve canons, in which the celibacy of the clergy was enjoined; and, in the 25th and last sessions, Dec. 3rd and 4th, the hastily composed decrees respecting purgatory, the worship of saints, relics and images, the monastic vows, indulgences, fasts, prohibition of certain kinds of food, and an index of prohibited books—the last of which, together with the composition of a catechism and breviary, was left to the Pope. In the decrees of reformation published in these last five sessions, which contained mostly insignificant or self-evident ordinances, or, at least, the same repeated, only with different words, provision was made for the removal of the prevailing abuses, for the conferring and administration of spiritual offices, sinecures, etc. The most useful provision was that for founding seminaries for the education of the clergy and the examination of those to be ordained. At the close of the last session the Cardinal of Lorraine and the other prelates made the walls resound with their cry, "Cursed be all heretics!" and thus ended the Council of Trent, the decrees of which, signed by 255 prelates, perpetuated the separation of the Protestant from the Catholic Church, and acquired with the latter the authority of a symbolical book. The Pope confirmed the decrees in their whole extent, Jan. 26th, 1564. The chief object of the Council, the gaining back the Protestants to the Catholic Church, had not been attained, and the points of dissension between the Roman and the Greek Churches were marked out so distinctly as to leave no hope of any future reconciliation. By its decrees, the Catholic doctrines were more exactly determined, and many abuses remedied, though some of the most pernicious were left. The decrees were received without limitation in Italy, Portugal, and Holland; in Spain they were restricted by the statutes of the kingdom in France, Germany, and Hungary they met with an opposition which gradually resulted in a silent approbation of the doctrinal decrees on the part of the Catholics, but has adduced and commented on in proof of the Divinity of Christ:—Is. viii. 13, 14, compared with 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8; Is. vi. 5, compared with John xii. 41; Is. xlv. 6, compared with Rev. xxii. 13; Is. xliii. 11, compared with 2 Pet. iii. 18; Rev. xxii. 6, compared with verse 16; Luke i. 76, compared with Matt. xi. 10; Luke i. 16, 17, compared with Matt. iii. 11; Matt. xi. 10, compared with Mal. iii. 1; Ps. lxxviii. 56, compared with 1 Cor. x. 9; John iii. 29, compared with Is. liv. 5; John xx. 28; Rom. ix. 5; 2 Pet. i. 1; 2 Cor. v. 19; John xiv. 11; 2 Cor. v. 20; 1 John v. 20; Col. ii. 8, 9; John i. 1; Is. ix. 6; Jer. xxiii. 6; Is. ii. 17, 18; Rev. i. 8.

He then gives one by one the texts adduced by the impugnors of the doctrine, and in each case places what he holds to be the true interpretation upon them. They are the following:—Matt. xix. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 24; Acts x. 42; Acts x. 40, 41; John iii. 16; Eph. iv. 32; John vi. 38; Acts iv. 29, 30; Matt. xx. 23; 1 Cor. viii. 6; Matt. xxiii. 9; John xiv. 28; 1 Cor. xi. 3; Mark xiii. 32; John i. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 27, 28; Jude 4, 24, 25.

To the same author we are indebted for the following list of texts in proof of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost:—John iii. 6, compared with 1 John v. 4; Acts xiii. 2, compared with Heb. v. 4; Matt. ix. 38, compared with Acts xiii. 4; Luke ii. 26, 28; John xiv. 17, compared with 1 Cor. xiv. 25; 2 Tim. iii. 16, compared with 2 Pet. i. 21; John vi. 45, compared with 1 Cor. ii. 13; Acts v. 3, 4; 1 John iii. 21, compared with 24; 1 Cor. iii. 16, compared with vi. 19; Matthew iv. 1, compared with Luke xi. 24; 2 Cor. i. 3; 1 Cor. ii. 11; Acts v. 9; Gen. vi. 3; Matt. xii. 28; Ezek. viii. 1–3; Acts iv. 24, 25. And he mentions, as claimed by opponents on their side, Matt. iii. 16; Heb. ii. 4; and Rom. viii. 26.

There is no question that the texts we have named were accepted as inspired Scripture by the whole of the early Church, and the result was the Church had before it the plainest assertions [1] that there is One God; and also [2] that Christ was called God, as was also the Holy Spirit. How, then, were these truths to be combined? Some of the early heretics, no doubt, became Tritheists, and declared that the New Testament revealed three Gods. But against this stood the plain words of Scripture, and the uniform teaching of the Apostolic Church. Another doctrine was that of the SABELLIANS, who taught that the three names, Father, Son, Holy Spirit, were but three manifestations of the same Person under different aspects, a doctrine which involved the opinion that the Father died upon the Cross. [PATRIPASSIANS.] The third and orthodox doctrine was that of the Trinity in Unity. The word "Trinity" is not found in Scripture, but the doctrine is held to be expressed in the words of Christ's commission [Matt. xxviii. 19], and in the Apostolic benediction [2 Cor. xiii. 14]. The word itself was first used by Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, in the second century. The early Fathers taught the doctrine by implication when they maintained the distinctness of the Son against the Sabellians, and the consubstantiality with the Father against the Arians; but it was the Councils of Nicæa and Constantinople, which, by affirming the Divinity of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, as well as the Unity of God, declared the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity to be the doctrine of the Church. The Athanasian Creed stated it in the most clear, emphatic, and categorical terms. From that time the doctrine was never called in question except by a few obscure sects, until the revolt against passive obedience, and the assertion of the freedom of the human conscience in the sixteenth century. That momentous epoch saw the doctrine of the Trinity again impugned, and Unitarianism thus became one phase of Protestantism. It is from this point of view that the doctrine must now be considered.

The great Reformers, equally with the Catholics, received and asserted the doctrine of the Trinity on the ground that it is clearly taught by Scripture when interpreted in its simple and natural sense. So evident is its implication in Scriptural statements, indeed, that Unitarians and Theists almost universally regard Scripture itself in a very different light from orthodox Christians, and attach to it a very much lower idea of Divine revelation, destitute of any really authoritative character. This ground of acceptance, then, may fitly be termed that of Authority, and is well set forth by the Protestant writer already cited, in terms which would also be accepted by all the historical Churches. We may take a few passages from the "conclusion" of his work, premising that the preceding body thereof consists of chapters upon [1] Scripture passages proving the Divinity of Christ; [2] the like proving the Divinity of the Holy Ghost; [3] texts proving the Plurality and Trinity of Persons; [4] Passages proving the Trinity in Unity. The "conclusion" first reviews the first two chapters (the texts most important to which have been above cited), and then proceeds:—

"It has appeared from the third chapter, that God is signified to us throughout the Old Testament by a name that is plural, and proved to be such from many particular instances; yet generally so restrained and qualified as to destroy the suspicion of a plurality of gods. That to this common name of God, many other plural names and expressions are added, and that an interchanging of the plural and singular is frequently observed, which neither grammar nor reason can account for upon any principle, but that of a real Divine plurality. That the Persons of God are three in number, precisely distinguished on some occasions by the personal names of the Father, the Word or Son, and the Holy Spirit, and gham, again, two centuries ago, protests against such divines as played into the hands of these objectors, by "affecting to represent the mystery of the Christian Trinity as a thing directly contradictory to all human reason and understanding, and that perhaps of design to make men surrender up themselves and conscience, in a blind and implicit faith, wholly to their guidance." The Christian does not believe that God is a Trinity in the same sense in which He is One; He is the only God in the same sense in which He co-exists as Three Persons. Further reply to this objection will appear in what follows concerning the second.

Any statement of the various intellectual analogies and explanations which have been resorted to assist an intelligent apprehension of the Divine Trinity in Unity must necessarily be brief. CUDWORTH [q.v.], as we have seen, was a Platonist, and has been misrepresented on that account; but he makes clear to himself, that his object was to show the wonderful providence of Almighty God, this doctrine of a Trinity of Divine Hypostases should find such admittance and maintenance in the pagan world, and be received by the wisest of their philosophers before the times of Christianity." He accordingly draws striking analogies between the Platonic Trinity, and especially that form in which the hypostases are described as the Goodness, Infinite Wisdom, and Infinite Love and Power (these not as accidents or qualities, but as all substantial), and the Christian doctrine. He implies—an idea in vogue of his own time, but far more familiar in this—that such an approximation to the most enlightened reason of antiquity is not without a real Divine illumination;

his own views concerning the Trinity resembled those of Dr. Samuel Clarke, this is sufficiently refuted, not only by his express statement that both the Son and the Holy Ghost were "co-eve and co-eternal with the Father" [Intellectual System of the Universe, 142], but by the definite statement that never the Platonic Trinity differed in any way, not only from Scripture, but from the same and Constantinopolitan Councils, and the doctrine of Athanasius, it is therein utterly disclaimed and rejected" by him. ibid., ii. 457.]

The analogy with a quasi-philosophical scheme, as cited by Cudworth, is in truth striking; and his work is, moreover, valuable as copiously citing within small compass the opinions and definitions of the various writers concerning the true meaning of the word homo-ousios. This, says Cudworth, is never used by Greek writers other-than to signify the agreement of things, numerically differing from one another in some common nature or universal essence." Hence St. Basil says that the word "plainly takes away the sameness of hypostasis [or individual person], for the same thing is not homo-ousios [co-substantial] with itself, but always one thing with another." [Epist. 300.] So Athanasius remarks [Epist. De Sent. Dicn.] that "the branches are homo-ousios with the vine, or with the root thereof." And the Council of Chalcedon affirms that the Lord Jesus Christ was homo-ousios with the Father as to His divinity, but homo-ousios with us men as to His humanity," and Athanasius himself uses the same word in relation to the Saviour and mankind in the same sense. Athanasius further says, "We do not think the Son to be really one and the same with the Father, as the Sabellians do, and to be mono-ousios and not homo-ousios: they thereby destroy the very being of the Son." [Exposition of Faith.]

Concerning the hypostases in the Trinity, BINGHAM [q.v.] is worth quoting, and his remarks are more noteworthy because in his own day he was charged by some with Tritheism:—

"For though the three Persons in their sense be three distinct numerical substances, yet they are neither, firstly, three Beings of a different nature, as Arius meant; nor, secondly, three Beings actually divided or separated from each other as three men and angels are, but most inseparably and eternally (yet without confusion) united into One; which union of substances is so necessary in infinite Beings, that we cannot possibly conceive them otherwise than as actually and eternally united into one; nor, thirdly, are they three parts of one whole, sharing Divine perfections amongst them, but every one is equally possessed of all (and this naturally follows from their being equal in nature, and so falls in with the first sort of Unity); nor, fourthly, are they three Beings having that Divine nature independently, every one from Himself; but the Father alone has His Being from Himself, the Son from the Father, the Holy Ghost from both; for though they all have a Divine nature, that is, a necessary existence (for necessary existence is the properest notion we can form of a Divine nature), yet they have that necessary existence three different ways: the Father necessarily exists, but of Himself alone; the Son necessarily exists, but from the Father; the Holy Ghost necessarily exists too, but from the Father and the Son; so that the Son and the Holy Ghost are not properly without original, though necessarily existing from all eternity, but are as necessary and eternal Emanations of a necessary and eternal Cause; and this way of existing is what distinguishes the Son and the Holy Ghost both from the Father and the creatures, and at once preserves the Unity of the Godhead. Fifthly, and lastly, by virtue of this original and natural subordination of the Son and the Holy Ghost to the Father, they are all the work of God—first, last and—has its divine personalities, distinct end, and its method, and its power. Salvation to the Father, through the Son, by the Spirit. The salvation is all in its end, its method, and its power are one. It is a three in one.

As we look into this a little more deeply, the perfection of any act consists in the end, and the harmony of these three: its end, its method, and its power. For instance, the act of a boy's education may extend over twenty years, but the whole of being considered as one act still, the time it begins in the nursery to the termination in his profession. Now the nature of that education will depend upon the perfection of its end, its method, and its power, and upon their being harmonious and suitable to, one another; each must be worthy of the rest. For instance, if the end, now, if no high ideal of scholarship character is set up at the first, and carried all along, you may give him the best means and the best teachers, you may surround him with the most eager enthusiasm, but it will turn out only a half-taught scholar, a mediocre man, as the result. The end was not worthy of the method and power. Or, if you set the highest standard up to be attained, and you put the purest ambitions into the nature, but you furnish only poor means, poor schools, poor teachers, and once again the education is imperfect. The method is not worthy of the end and the power. Or, if you make the ideal perfect, and you furnish all the appliances of study at their disposal, but you put only some low or mercenary motive into the scholar's heart, perhaps a slavish submission to your authority, or only a selfish idea of the money he can get out of his learning, and again an imperfect product comes.

This is an illustration. Instead of a boy's education, we put a man's salvation. That is the education of which all others are but illustrations. And there we look for and we find the harmony of end, method, and power. Each is unworthy of the others and the result is not complete. If it be not to the glory of the Son's redemption is in vain. If it be not through the Son, the Father waits in vain. If the Spirit moves for naught. If it be not by the Spirit, the Father's heart stands open in vain. If the method of grace is perfect, but the end is not, the soul stands inactive and unsaved. Scripture revelation comes to tell us that the end, method, and power, all are perfect, and that thus be worthy of the rest. The end, method, and power are one. Each is eternal, and yet, as the Creed cries, 'There are not three Gods, but One Eternal.' Each is God, and yet there are not three Gods, but one God, one salvation, but one salvation, with one end and method and power, and so in the Trinity in Unity the soul is saved.

. . . . Now we are very apt to take it for granted that however we may differ in our definitions and our belief of the Deity of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, we are all at one, there can be and there is no hesitation about the Deity of the Father. God is divine; God is God. And no doubt we do all assent in words to such belief; but when we think what we mean by that word 'God;' when we remember what we mean by 'Father,' namely, the first source and the final satisfaction of a dependent nature; and then when we look around and see such multitudes of people living as if there were no higher source for their being than accident, and no higher satisfaction for their being than selfishness, do we not feel that there is need of a continual and most earnest preaching by word and act from every pulpit of influence to which we can mount, of the divinity of the Father? Why, take a man who is utterly absorbed in the business of the world. . . . To such a man, what is the first revelation that you want to make? Is it not the divinity of the Father? Remember that wonderful passage in the story of the Passover where Jesus, with His agony before Him, is just rising to work His homely parable of washing the disciples' feet. And the description of the act is this: 'Jesus knowing that He was come from God and went to God, riseth from supper and laid aside His garments, and took a towel and girded Himself.' That was the key to all His life, the spring of every action: 'Knowing that He came from God and went to God,' knowing, that is, that God was His Father, the source and the satisfaction of His life. And that same knowledge which Christ had, you would want your friend to have. Does it seem as if no man could escape it? Does it seem as if the Divine Fatherhood were the patent fact of all creation? As if Nature uttered it in all her voices? These voices are not fancies. They are real. But the clear fact remains that multitudes of men do go through life and only in the dimmest tones hear either Nature or their own hearts proclaiming God. To such the truth must be uttered from some teaching of experience or doctrine. The divinity of the Father needs assertion first of all. Let men once feel it, and then Nature and their own hearts will come in with their sweet and solemn confirmations of it. But Nature and the human heart do not teach it of themselves. So we believe, and so we tempt other men to believe in God the Father. . . .

"And now pass to the divinity of the method. 'Through Jesus Christ.' Man is separated from God. That fact, testified to by broken associations, by alienated affections, by conflicting wills, stands written in the whole history of our race. And equally clear is it to holiness and love and faith which they were made to hold, but which is greater than themselves. The Divine power has taken possession of the soul's capacities, and, although it may seem at first as if the soul itself had originated this new movement to God through Christ, just as it may seem to the child at first as if his body did all these spiritual acts which the spirit does within it, yet, by-and-by, the conviction clears itself, and grows clearer and clearer constantly, that it is not the soul's simple ability to be religious that has made it religious, but that God by direct visitation has occupied that ability, and is drawing the soul to Himself.

"When this experience is reached, then see what Godhood the soul has come to recognise in the world. First, there is the Creative Deity from which it sprang, and to which it is struggling to return—the Divine End, God the Father. Then there is the Incarnate Deity, which makes that return possible by the exhibition of God's love—the Divine Method, God the Son; and then there is this infused Deity, this Divine energy in the soul itself, taking its capacities and setting them homeward to the Father—the Divine Power of Salvation, God the Holy Spirit. To the Father, through the Son, by the Spirit. . . . This appears to me the truth of the Deity as it relates to us. I say again, 'as it relates to us.' What it may be in itself; how Father, Son, and Spirit meet in the perfect Godhood; what infinite truth more there may, there must, be in that Godhood, no man can dare to guess. But, to us, God is the end, the method, and the power of salvation; so He is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. I look at the theologies, and so often it seems as if the harmony of Father, Son, and Spirit had been lost, both by those that own and by those that disown the Trinity. One theology makes the Father hard and cruel, longing, as it were, for man's punishment, extorting from the Son the last drop of life-blood which man's sin had incurred as penalty. Another theology makes the Son merely one of the multitude of sinning men, with somewhat bolder aspirations laying hold on a forgiveness which God might give, but which no mortal might assume. Still another theology can find no God in the human heart at all; merely a fermentation of human nature in this desire after goodness, this reaching out towards Divinity. The end is not worthy of the method; I do not want to come to such a Father as some of the theologians have painted. Or the method is not worthy of the end; no man could come to a perfect God through such a Jesus as some men have described. Or the power is too weak for both; and all that Christ has done lies useless; and all the Father's welcome waits in vain for the soul that has in it no Holy Ghost. But let each be real, and each be worthy of the others, and the salvation is complete. That is our faith in the Trinity—'three Persons and one God.' " [Sermons, New York, 1875.]

Analogies have also been drawn from the physical universe around us, as in the following passage from a work on physical science,* in which it is even suggested that, beyond mere analogy, there may be some actual manifestation of this mystery of the Divine nature, as of the Divine attributes, in the physical world around us. After a brief summary of the main results of experiment and research as regards the theory of Light, the writer concludes as follows:—

"Another step further yet. The inquiry is irresistibly suggested, whether the comparison and the analogy may not go further, and afford us some revelation deeper still. That inquiry is strictly legitimate. If our universe be in truth an objective and conditioned manifestation of any absolute Source of all being, it should be thus: the Actual ought, in its limited measure, to reveal to us truly the Essential and Eternal. The student of nature, at all events, does hold expressly that if Nature has any Author, she must speak aright of Him if she speak at all; and as for the so-called religious man, while any book can only take a secondary place in such an inquiry as this, he also believes that it ought to be thus, since his book actually says so. The point of surpassing interest therefore is, whether as regards this question there is any definite agreement between these two, as to which Science can have anything to say, or possesses any means of judging. What then do we find? We are bound here, at least, to ask the expounders of physical science first, for every reason. We inquire, therefore, what purely physical science, and experiment, and speculation—what they at present appear to teach us?

"[1] They tell us of an intangible, invisible Ether, which cannot be touched, or tasted, or contained, or measured, or weighed, but yet is everywhere; which contains within itself the most essential properties of Matter, fluid and solid; and yet which is not matter, though it can communicate its own motions to matter and receive motions from it. [2] They speak to us next, according to the latest and most widely-received vortex theory of Sir William Thomson, something vaguely about this Ether taking Form. They suggest to us how vortices in it may appear to us as the atoms of Matter, which we do see, and feel, and handle; and which, in this form, can be limited, and contained, and measured, and weighed; and in which the Ether may become, as it were, incarnate and embodied. [3] They tell us, in the third place, of a mysterious Energy, which also takes protean forms, but which, in one form or other, is doing all is of our reason. It is remarkable, at least, that the doctrine of the Trinity has been accepted by many of the most profound and original philosophers who, leaving the old creeds, have sought out independent lines of thought, and who were the last men in the world to accept a mere dry creed, or to rely on anything merely upon authority under any circumstances. The deep teaching of the mystic JACOB BENJAMIN [q.v.], obscure as it is, has exercised a great influence on modern philosophy. The great names of Spinoza, Schelling, Schleiermacher, may all be used as those of men who have felt there is a profound truth in the Catholic doctrine, which answers to the facts of nature and the needs of the soul, and which would be a rejection of all dogma but that of the deity of God.

Trinity Sunday.—This festival is not of ancient date as the rest of the feasts of the Church. Stephen, bishop of Liège [820], had an office drawn up relating to the mystery of the Trinity, and made its way into other churches, and at some time the practice was adopted on the ground that the praises of the Trinity were celebrated daily, and that it did not need a particular festival, but when the church was attacked by the Arians and the Church thought it right to fix a day in its honour. It is said that the Council of XII fixed it for the Sunday following Whitsunday; but this is questionable, as in the 13th century a Cardinal is found asking Benedict to settle this festival; and Gerson remarks that in his time the keeping of it was begun. The reason why this day was chosen as most seasonable was that after Christ had ascended into heaven and the Holy Spirit had been sent down, as on Whitsunday, the Church received a fuller knowledge of the Father and incomprehensible Trinity than before.

Trithemism.—The doctrine which teaches that there are three Gods, instead of three persons in the Godhead. There was a sect of men in very early times who turned the doctrine of the Trinity into Trithemism, instead of three Divine Persons under the unity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, it was three collateral, co-ordinate, and unoriginated beings, making them three deities and independent principles, without subordination of Father or Son, which is the proper notion of three Gods. And having made this change in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, they made another answerable to it in the form of baptism, for, instead of baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, they brought in an unheard-of form of baptism in the name of three un-originated principles, as we learn from one of the Apostolical Canons, which says: "If any bishop or presbyter baptize not according to the command of Christ, 'In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,' but in three unoriginated principles, or in three Sons, or in three Paracletes or Holy Ghosts, let him be deposed." It is supposed that this doctrine was introduced by a branch of the Gnostics.

Trithemius, JOHN, Abbot of Spanheim, in the diocese of Treves [b. 1482, d. 1516].—He was transferred to a convent at Wurzburg, where he died. The most remarkable of his works are on Church history—De illustribus Scripturis Ecclesiasticis and Catalog. illustr. virorum Germaniam sine ingenio et lucubrationibus emendatissimum exornantium. He was accused of magic and unlawful correspondence with spirits, but his character has been vindicated from this charge by several writers.

Truce of God [in the Latin of the Middle Ages, Truce Dei (truce or treue, from the German word treu, "faithful") was a limitation of the right of private warfare introduced by the Church in order to mitigate an evil which it was unable to eradicate. It provided that hostilities should cease, at least on the holy-days, from Thursday evening to Sunday evening in each week, also during the whole seasons of Advent and Lent, and on the octaves of great festivals. This regulation was first introduced in 1017, in Aquitaine, where a bishop professed to have received command from God for its institution; then in France and Burgundy. In 1038 the Diet of Soleure deliberated respecting its establishment in Germany; under William the Conqueror it was introduced into England, and in 1071 into the Netherlands. It was a subject of discussion at many Councils; at Narbonne [1054], Troyes [1093], Clermont [1095], Rouen [1096], Rheims [1135], and St. John Lateran [1139 and 1179], and was enjoined by special decrees. At a later period the truce was extended to Thursday; excommunication was the penalty for those who engaged in private warfare on those days. The truce was also extended to certain places, as churches, convents, hospitals, etc., and certain persons, as clergymen, peasants in the fields, and in general all defenceless persons. At the Council of Clermont it was made particularly to include all crusaders.

Trudpert.—A missionary trained in Ireland who started off when he heard of the work accomplished by St. Gall [q.v.], in the desire, if possible, of carrying it on after his death. He chose the Black Forest as his mission field, but when he got as far as Breisgau he was cruelly murdered by his enemies.

was appointed one of the Queen's chaplains, and used frequently to preach before her. In 1878 he was Moderator of the General Assembly. Since then he wrote some valuable theological works, the principal being Rational Theology in the Seventeenth Century, The Christian Doctrine of Sin, Facts of Religion and Life, and Movements of Religious Thought during the Nineteenth Century.

Tunkers. [DUNKERS.]

Tunstall, CUTHBERT, Bishop of Dur- ham, born about 1476, at Hackforth in Hert- fordshire. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, whence he removed to Padua, and took a Doctor's degree. He was a good scholar, being a perfect master of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and the best mathe- matician of his times; he was likewise a considerable civilian, canonist, and divine. He obtained the living of Stanhope in 1508, in 1515 became Archdeacon of Chester, in 1516 Rector of Harrow-on-the-Hill and Master of the Rolls, and in 1519 Dean of Salisbury. He went abroad on several em- bassies; amongst others he was sent by Henry VIII., in 1525, to treat with the Em- peror for the release of Francis I. of France. In 1522 he was consecrated Bishop of London, in 1523 made Privy Seal, and in 1530 translated to the See of Durham. He was a decided Reformer, but without separating himself from the Church; he acknowledged the King's supremacy, and remained in favour with Henry VIII., to whom he surrendered the monastery of Durham in 1540. In 1552, not being pre- pared to accept Edward VI.'s sweeping mea- sures, he was ejected from his See, but was restored again by Queen Mary, and ejected a second time by Queen Elizabeth in 1559, on declining to take the oath of supremacy, and died the same year at Lambeth, where he had been placed under a mild surveillance.

Turks.—The name in one of the Good Friday Collects under which are included in the prayers the followers of Mahomet, in whatever land they may be. In the four classes, Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics, are meant to be included all who are out of the Communion of the Church.

Turlupins.—A sect of the fourteenth century who had their chief seat in the Isle de France. They were the same as the Brethren of the Free Spirit, who were con- demned by the Roman Pontiffs. There is nothing to explain the meaning of the name "Turlupin." They ran from place to place begging their bread with wild shouts, and refusing every kind of labour as a hindrance to Divine contemplation and the ascent of the soul towards God. In their excursions they were followed by women, with whom they lived in the most intimate familiarity. They distributed amongst the people books which 1811], as Reinhard had maintained that the entire separation of Rationalism from Supernaturalism was indispensable. In 1814 he accompanied the Saxon troops, under the Grand Duke of Weimar, as chaplain. In 1815 the Corporation of Leipzig appointed him a minister in that city. In 1821 he published his Explanation of Haller's Secession, and, in 1822, Catholicism and Protestantism in a Political Point of View, which quickly went through three editions and was translated into English, French, and Dutch; both works were occasioned by Haller's becoming a Catholic. In several publications he attacked the arrogance of Catholicism and the mysticism of Protestants. His last work was How Did it Happen that France remained Catholic? in Pölitz's Annals of History and Politics. He died very suddenly.

U

Ubiquitarians [from Lat. ubique, "everywhere"].—A sect of Lutherans which rose and spread itself in Germany, and whose distinguishing doctrine was that the body of Jesus Christ is everywhere, or in every place. Brentz, one of the early Reformers, is said to have broached this error in 1560; Andreas and Flacius helped to spread it. They were heartily opposed by the Universities of Wittenberg and Leipzig. Soon after, a controversy began in the Palatinate about the oral manducation of the Body of our Lord in the Sacrament. To prevent the ill consequences of this dispute Frederick III. ordered the Heidelberg Catechism to be drawn up. [HEIDELBERG CATECHISM; URSI-NUS.] Afterwards, at the Conference at Maulbronn, 1564, they argued about the sense of the words used at the receiving of the Sacrament. Luther and Melancthon both denied that they held the doctrine of ubiquity, but after their death the disputes were renewed, and this hypothesis was dressed up in a specious and plausible form by Brentz, Chemnitz, and others, who maintained the communication of the properties of Christ's Divinity to His human nature. In 1577, at the monastery of Bergen, it was recognised as a Lutheran doctrine in the Formula of Concord, though by no means all the Lutheran divines are agreed on this point. The divines of Tübingen in the seventeenth century upheld the theory in opposition to the divines of Giessen.

Ubiquity. [UBIQUITARIANS.]

Uckewallists.—A sect who derived their name from Uke Walles, a native of Friesland, who published his opinions in 1637. He entertained the doctrine of Universalism, and believed in the eternal salvation of Judas and the rest of Christ's murderers. His argument was, that the period of time between the birth of Christ and the descent of the Holy Ghost was a time of deep ignorance, during which the Jews were deprived of Divine light, and that therefore their sins would not be visited with the deepest severity. His followers did not long retain his name as a badge of separation, and became merged in the MENNONITES [q.v.], to whose doctrines their founder strictly adhered.

Ullmann, KARL, a great evangelical theologian, born at Epfenbach, in Baden, in 1796, died 1865. He was first educated in the schools of Morbach and Heidelberg, and afterwards in the Universities of Heidelberg and Tübingen. His first work, written while he was a private tutor, Ueber die Sündlosigkeit Christi ["On the Sinlessness of Christ"], at once gained for its author the reputation of a powerful theologian. He had been under the influence of Neander, and must be held one of his most distinguished disciples. In 1821 he was appointed Professor of Divinity at Heidelberg, and there made the acquaintance of UMBREIT [q.v.], with whom he began the publication of a journal called Studien und Kritiken. It has been in existence ever since, and is one of the most able and widespread theological journals in Germany. He was always an advocate for theological discussion being utterly unrestricted, his first essay on the subject being published at Halle in 1830, whither he had recently been invited to become professor. He soon, however, returned to Heidelberg, where he was made Director of the highest ecclesiastical council [Oberkirchenrath], a position of great trust and dignity. Here he wrote several articles against Strauss's Life of Christ. Some years later, in 1853, he was elected to the office of Bishop, so called, in the duchy of Baden, and went to live at Karlsruhe, where he stayed till his death. His greatest work is of an historical nature, and raises Ullmann to the rank of one of the chief historians of this century. Its title is Reformers before the Reformation. He strenuously maintains that the Reformers based their teaching on that of the Bible, while the Roman Catholics ignored the Bible altogether. He worked hard, but not successfully, to unite the different Protestant sects that existed in Baden, and also to raise and improve the social position of the Lutheran clergy.

Ulphilas.—The most interesting figure in the history of early Teutonic Christianity. All nations of Germanic descent may be said to owe to him the beginning of their religion and literature. The knowledge we possess of the working of the Church in the fourth century is very scanty, but the life of Ulphilas, the Apostle to the Goths, as he is called, is a striking exception. He was born in the year 318, during the reign of the Emperor Constantine, and while still young was appointed chaplain to the Emperor, and years of his life, being old and worn out with work and constant fasting. But his people were so attached to him that they could not bear the idea of losing him, and begged him to remain, which he did. He died July 4th, 973, and was buried in his cathedral, which has since been named after him. He was canonised by Pope John XV., in a Bull dated Feb. 993; his canonisation is remarkable as being the first ordered to be considered general. Up to that time the saints were only revered in their own diocese or province. [CANONISATION.]

Ultramontanism [from ultra montes, "the other side of the mountains" —i.e. the Alps].—As the nations north of the Alps—France, Germany, etc.—have been opposed to the Papal assumption of absolute power, they have termed the endeavours of the Roman Curia to extend the papal authority and destroy the consequence of the national Churches, such as the Gallican Church, ultramontanism. Those who explain the Canon Law on ultramontane principles are called Curialists. [CURIA ROMANA.] Ultramontanism may be briefly described as the endeavour to render the Catholic Churches of the various countries more subservient to the Pope than is compatible with the existing ecclesiastical laws of the various countries, with the rights of the bishops and Sovereigns, with the independence and intellectual freedom of each country, and with various elements of Catholicism itself. Its principles are decidedly in the spirit of GREGORY VII. [q.v.]. Among the books that have been written on the subject are Count Montlosier's work against the sovereignty of priests—Mémoire à consulter sur un Système religieux et politique tendant à renverser la Religion, la Société, et le Trône [Paris, 1826]. Its most eloquent defender was the Abbé de Lamennais, whose work—De la Religion considérée dans ses Rapports avec l'Ordre politique et civil—defends the supremacy of ecclesiastical powers over the secular in all States; declares all Protestants, and even the Jansenists, atheists, and affixes the same stigma to the Government, because the charter of France allows freedom of religious worship.

Umbreit, FRIEDRICH WILHELM KARL, Protestant theologian, was born at Sonneborn, in the duchy of Saxe-Gotha, in 1795; died, 1860. At the University of Göttingen he made the acquaintance of Eichhorn, who inspired him with that love of Oriental languages which is to be discovered all through his works. These, almost entirely, are devoted to the study and explanation of the Old Testament. He considered that part of the Bible to be neglected in Germany, as it still is in some parts, and therefore wrote to show the depth and power to be found in the writings of the Prophets. He was professor at Heidelberg between the years 1823 and 1829, and was engaged with ULLMANN [q.v.] in the editorship of Studien und Kritiken. His principal works were: Lied des Liedes, das älteste und schönste aus dem Morgenlande ("The Song of Songs, the oldest and most beautiful from the East"); Uebersetzung und Auslegung des Buch Hiob ("Version of the Book of Job"); Grundtöne des alten Testaments ("Fundamental Principles of the Old Testament,") etc., etc.

Unam Sanctam.—The name given to a Bull, published in 1302 by Boniface VIII., which fully defined the powers claimed by the Pope. It asserted the unity of the Catholic Church under St. Peter and his successors, and declared that those who denied this doctrine denied their own Christianity. "There are two swords, the spiritual and the temporal: our Lord said not of these two swords, 'It is too much,' but 'It is enough.' Both are in the power of the Church: the one the spiritual, to be used by the Church, the other the material, for the Church; the former that of priests, the latter that of kings and soldiers, to be wielded at the command and by the sufferance of the priest. One sword must be under the other, the temporal under the spiritual. . . . The spiritual instituted the temporal power, and judges whether that power is well exercised. If the temporal power errs, it is judged by the spiritual. To deny this is to assert, with the heretical Manicheans, two co-equal principles. We therefore assert, define, and pronounce that it is necessary to salvation to believe that every human being is subject to the Pontiff of Rome." This Bull was revoked by Clement V. in 1305, under pressure from Philip the Fair of France.

Unhallowed Uses.—When a church or chapel is consecrated the building is said to be henceforth separated "from all unhallowed, ordinary, and common uses." By this is meant such as have not been made sacred or consecrated to holy purposes.

Uniformity, ACTS OF.—Acts which secure in every congregation of the Church of England the same form of public prayer, administration of Sacraments and other rites. The first was passed in 1559, which confirmed the Revised Prayer Book of Edward VI., and inflicted severe penalties on those who should have any other form used in church: for the first offence they were to forfeit their goods; for the second, to be imprisoned a year; for the third, life imprisonment. All who absented themselves from church on Sundays and Holy Days, without just cause, were to be fined a shilling.

The second and by far the most important Act of Uniformity was passed in 1662, by which all ministers were required to give their assent to the Book of Common Prayer, and to Newton. Towards the close of the last century several clergymen of the Established Church (Lindsey, Jebb, Wakefield, Disney, and others) resigned their benefices in consequence of having adopted Unitarian views, while, at the same time, among numerous converts from the Dissenters, appear the names of Doctors Priestly, Price, Aikin, Rees, and others of scientific and literary merit. Amongst the General Baptists many became Unitarians. In the Presbyterian Churches of the North of Ireland the Unitarians have a society of their own, consisting of several presbyteries. In Scotland there are Unitarian chapels in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere. The supply of Unitarian ministers is chiefly from Manchester College, at York; some, however, come from the Scotch and Dublin universities.

JOSEPH PRIESTLY [q.v.], a Nonconformist minister of Birmingham, ordained in 1774, openly avowed his belief in the non-inspiration of Scripture, and maintained that Christ was no more than a man, and that it was idolatry to worship Him, thus taking a strictly Humanitarian view. Priestly was compelled to leave Birmingham in 1793, and he died in America in 1804. After his death the writings and labours of Thomas Belsham did much to support Unitarianism. In 1811 he published his celebrated work, Calm Inquiry into the Scripture Doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, which was an able defence of his creed, and is to this hour considered the standard work on the subject.

The Unitarian faith appears first to have been avowed in Germany soon after the Reformation by Martin Cellarius, a native of Stuttgart, who adopted Luther's views, but afterwards developed Unitarian principles, for which he was imprisoned, released in 1536, and died at Basle in 1564. Among other theologians who about the same time were led to a like result were Lewis Hetzer, put to death at Constance in 1529; John Campanus, of Wittenberg; Adam Pastor, of Westphalia; and Claudius, a Frenchman, who, about 1530, preached his doctrines in Switzerland and Alsace. Still more noticeable was MICHAEL SERVETUS [q.v.], put to death in 1553.

In Holland, Erasmus John, Rector of the College of Antwerp, published, in 1585, an anonymous work favouring this doctrine, called Antithesis Doctrinæ Christi et Anti-Christi de Uno Vero Deo. He was forthwith banished. Thirteen years later, Ostorode and Voidove, for similar publications, were ordered by the States-General to leave the United Provinces within ten days and to have their writings burnt. In 1627 Adolphus Venator was banished for composing a work which savoured of Socinianism, and in 1653, finding that Unitarians were increasing in Holland, the States-General, after consulting with the divines of Leyden, issued an edict forbidding the profession of the Socinian heresy and holding of its assemblies; but this does not appear to have been carried into rigid execution. To mention no other names than Episcopius and Grotius, there has probably always been a large number of Unitarians among the Remonstrants of Holland, and recent publications show that Unitarian opinions have disseminated themselves in that country to no inconsiderable extent.

As early as 1690 some English ministers complained to a synod, convened at Amsterdam, of the growing heterodoxy of the Genevan Church. In 1757, in the French Encyclopædia, the article "Geneva" announced that "many of the ministers disbelieved the Divinity of Jesus Christ, of which Calvin, their leader, was the zealous defender." In 1798, the catechism of Calvin was superseded by another, of a character to indicate the justness of this statement. In 1807 a Liturgy, expurgated upon Unitarian principles, was substituted for that formerly in use, and two years earlier a professedly amended version of the Scriptures, which had been in preparation for upwards of a century, was published under the authority of the Venerable Company of Pastors.

In America Unitarian principles appear to have been extensively adopted in Massachusetts as early as the middle of the last century. In 1756 Emlyn's Humble Inquiry into the Scripture Account of Jesus Christ was published in Boston, and in one of its churches a Liturgy excluding the doctrine of the Trinity was adopted. In 1805 attention was drawn to the subject by several publications, occasioned by the appointment of a distinguished Unitarian (Dr. Henry Ware) to the Divinity Chair of the American University of Cambridge; in 1816 the controversy was revived by a republication of a chapter from Belsham's Life of Lindsey, with the title American Unitarianism. Dr. Priestly visited Philadelphia, and started a small society there in 1794. Since then they have congregations in various parts of the United States; their ministers are supplied chiefly from Cambridge. Besides the Congregational Unitarians, the denomination called Christians, which is numerous, maintains Unitarian opinions, and they also prevail in the Reformed Baptists.

In France many of the Protestant clergy reject the doctrine of the Trinity, and the principal sources of supply for their ministry are the schools of Geneva and Montauban. A society has been formed in Paris called the Unitarian Association of France.

Unitarians profess to derive their views from Scripture, and to make it the ultimate arbiter in all religious questions, thus distinguishing themselves from the Rationalists of Germany. They say that being interpreted according to the settled laws of language, the uniform testimony of the Scripture is, that the Holy Spirit has no

Whilst Seabury was in Europe American Churchmen were not idle; they held a Convention of Clerical and Lay Delegates in 1785, to choose some candidates who should be sent to England for consecration. Their choice fell on Dr. White and Dr. Provoost, and on Feb. 4th, 1787, these were consecrated in Lambeth Palace Chapel, and the Church of England gave to the American Colonies which yet remained to her Bishop Inglis, who may be regarded as the first missionary bishop. The Rev. J. Madison was consecrated at Lambeth in 1790, and thus there were sufficient bishops to consecrate others in America as they should be wanted. The first Consecration Service performed by American bishops took place in 1792, when Dr. Thomas Claggett was made Bishop of Maryland in Trinity Church, New York. There are now forty-eight bishops, four assistant bishops, and fourteen missionary bishops. They elect one of their number to be the presiding bishop at their Conventions. The friendly relations between the Church of England and the American Church have been greatly cemented by the meetings known as the PAN-ANGLICAN SYNODS [q.v.].

Wesley was so disgusted with the apathy of the Church at home that he did not wait for its help, but proceeded to ordain clergy and consecrate bishops for America. These now form the body known as the Methodist Episcopal Church.

All the religious bodies in the United States are voluntary. The principal theological seminaries are at New York, Cambridge, Madison, Rochester, Princeton, Hartford, and Andover.

Unity of the Church.—The importance of Christian Unity is plainly declared in the New Testament, as well as in the conscience of Christian men. It was one of the principal topics of our Lord's prayer on the night of His Agony [John xvii. 20]. The Apostles accordingly treated the question as one of transcendent moment, asserted the Unity of the Body with great emphasis, and warned disciples against endangering it [Eph. iv. 4—6]. Yet, when we look upon Christendom as it is, we seem to behold a picture of a very different character. The disciples of Jesus, professing to be His members and followers, and to live in union with Him, are broken into a countless number of outward communions, and the question at once arises, "Has the Saviour's prayer been answered?" To this question there are three main lines of answer.

[1] The Church of Rome declares that there was established one visibly connected religious community, of which St. Peter was appointed the head, this headship devolving upon his successors in the Roman See until the end of the world. It is therefore a mark of true Churches throughout the world, that they dutifully submit themselves to the Roman authority, and so preserve themselves in the original organic Unity of the Church. All who do not confess this obedience, and refuse to submit themselves to the central authority of the Roman Church, are in schism, and the religious bodies to which they belong have no right to the name of Churches.

[2] The view which we may call the Anglican, is that the Church was intended to preserve an organic Unity under its Bishops, but not under one visible head. Doubtless, in the Apostolic times, the Unity was so preserved, that all branches of the Church were in communion with the other branches throughout the world. Bingham gives his view of the means which were taken by the Church to preserve this Unity as the Church spread far and wide over the world, and he states them thus:—

[a] The Unity of faith was principally insisted on as the foundation; and next to this the Unity of holiness. When Christ sent forth His Apostles He enjoined them two things:—To baptise the nations in the Name [or faith] of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and to teach them to observe all things whatsoever He had commanded them [Matt. xxviii. 20]. "If it be inquired," he goes on to say, "what articles of faith and what points of practice were reckoned thus fundamental or essential to the very being of a Christian, and the union of many Christians into one body or Church, the ancients are very plain in resolving this. For as to fundamental articles of faith, the Church had them always collected out of Scripture in her creeds; and as to the other point of obedience to the laws and institutions of Christ, it was generally summed up into the short form of renouncing the devil and his science and his works, and covenanting with Christ to live by the rules of His Gospel."

[b] The Church required that men should unite themselves to her by baptism, to be administered but once, and that by the hands of a regular ministry, except some urgent necessity obliged them to do otherwise.

[c] Another requisite was Unity of worship, common prayer, and the administration of the Word and Sacraments. "Which did not require that all Churches should exactly agree in the same form of words—for it was no breach of unity for different Churches to have different modes and circumstances and ceremonies in performing the same holy offices, so long as they kept to the substance of the institution. But that which was required was that every particular member of any Church should comply with the particular customs and usages of his own Church (nothing being inserted into her offices that was unlawful), and meet for religious worship." There are several canons in the

but at a monthly mission service, for which the regular worshippers vacate their seats, and make an effort to gather in those who habitually attend no place of worship. Against this the Bishop, his attention being drawn to the matter, remonstrates, on the ground mainly of what is expressed in the following passages, which may be compared with those cited above —

"There are certain principles of the English Church which she has held almost throughout her history, and which, but for her, would have been probably lost sight of in the world. One is that the Church of Christ (not only an invisible spiritual company, but the visible living organism) is a gift of God, and has lived on in an unbroken continuity from the days of our Lord's bodily presence unto this day. So the Church is from above, not from beneath, and it is not possible for a single man, or body of men, in several times to constitute a new Church at their own pleasure. Another is that, though the Church is Divine, it has yet human elements, and so may require pruning, prudent and careful pruning, if it runs into excessive or unhealthy growth. Unless these two principles are true, the Church of England is indefensible, her very raison d'être is gone. The Church as one with the Church of the New Testament and the primitive ages, the Church as reformed (when corrupt) on the exact model of the primitive body, these two are the pillars on which she rests. To give these up is to give up all, for if they are not sound the Church of England cannot be defended, either (1) for having separated herself from communion with the Roman patriarch, or (2) for not simply taking her stand as one of a number of Protestant sects."

"Now to ignore this, to break down all boundaries, to acknowledge that we are but one of a multitude of heterogeneous communities of human origin, is to deprive us of our vantage ground, and the world of the hope which springs from our occupying such vantage ground. If we, and all the other Christian bodies in England, are to be described as alike 'Churches of different denominations,' then we are the most schismatical body in the world, occupying a position to which we have no right, unless we are, indeed, the ancient Church of the nation come down in a continuous stream from the fountain head."

In a second letter responding to a reply from Canon Wilberforce, the Bishop implies that the maintenance of this Church position is the real hope for the unity of the Church in the future, and says:—

"My chief objection to dissent is not to the doctrines or discipline of any particular sect, but that its very principle is to ignore the unity of the Church of Christ, inventing a thing unknown to Scripture and the primitive Christians, of a spiritual, invisible community only, and instead of the one Body of Christ, substituting a multitude of dis-united and disconnected sects. All that tends to confirm and perpetuate this theory is a direct countermove to the prayer of our Blessed Lord, that His Church might be One as a united witness to the world" (John xvi 23).

To this it should be added that the Bishop himself and those who agree with him pass no judgment on the piety or the devotion of Nonconformists. It would be absurd and contrary to plain facts to question the deep religious earnestness and intense spirituality of such men as Baxter or Robert Hall. But Churchmen hold that the Church of England, with her precise formularies, her august traditions, and her apostolic ministry, is peculiarly fitted to be a pillar and ground of the truth, that though she has at times seemed to bow before the set of public opinion, it was but for the moment, and that she quickly recovered her position, and especially that her influence has been very great, and was never greater than now, upon religious bodies outside her pale. Those who hold this view point to the vast difference between the Roman clergy in England and those in other parts of Europe, and hold that the high superiority in England is owing to the influence of Protestantism upon them, while it is urged that the influence of our Liturgy and of Church teaching upon the Nonconformist bodies also is indirectly very great, and that where such influence has been absent, as in America and elsewhere, Nonconformity has passed into avowed Unitarianism. On these grounds Anglicans hold that for the Church to practise self-effacement, and to abandon her distinctive marks and insignia, would be to inflict a blow upon religion in general, without furthering the cause of Christian brotherhood.

(3) It remains to state the Nonconformist view of this great question. This is of necessity very largely a direct negative to many of the statements on which the foregoing argument is based, but accompanied also by a positive doctrine of a totally different character. It will be convenient to state each aspect of this view in turn.

Nonconformists altogether deny that the "government, discipline, and worship" referred to in the foregoing, are (as there implied) "Apostolic," on which the entire argument depends. They deny this on the following alleged grounds. (a) Whilst it may be traced to early Fathers and the early Church, it cannot be found in the New Testament, or traced to the primitive Church, and is therefore due to corruption and a craving after outward ceremonial, which have ever been active in causing such developments. They point to the historical fact that the growth of ecclesiastical prerogative was of great rapidity during the early centuries, and believe therefore that the process crept in at an exceedingly early period, and that the only safe authority for the practice and nature of the really Primitive Church is to be found in the teaching and history contained in the New Testament itself. (b) When thus tested, according to the simple, evident, natural meaning of the text, much of the Episcopal system (they say) is in direct contrast to Apostolic teaching and practice, neither of which gives the slightest hint of a worship confined to Liturgy, of "consecrated" elements, of a ministry confined to Episcopal "orders," or of any of the modern ideas of a "bishop" whatsoever, but very many indications and hints of the contrary to all these things. (c) If Episcopal claims are just, the difference between their own view and the Episcopal, in regard to ministry and in the Episcopal form, it is very strange that no means were taken to ensure so important an object, which a very few sentences of apostolic instruction would easily have done; whereas there is none such, but countless exhortations to the Unity of Spirit. [b] If organic union were the true Unity, and so far beyond other considerations as Anglicans make it, then the days when it was as yet unbroken would exhibit the golden age of the Church in piety, devotedness, and holiness. The direct contrary is the case, and the Reformation movements were simultaneous with true religious revival in an age of nauseous ecclesiastical corruption. [c] Those who, at a later period, adhered to the Anglican Unity, would be, on the whole, conspicuously superior in Christian graces and work, and those who departed from it, on the whole, marked by deficiency in these respects; regarding the great secessions caused by the Act of Uniformity, and under the Wesleys, and in other cases, they allege that the very reverse was conspicuously the case. [d] Lastly, they say that the Episcopal idea of Unity has absolutely no promise and no hope (beyond an absolute surrender of men's convictions such as is demanded by Rome), and has been evidently and conspicuously condemned by the Providence of God itself, since it is manifestly now impossible and impracticable, and every day sees its realisation further removed; while, on the other hand, the Unity of the Spirit, openly manifested in the sight of men, is quite practicable, is only limited by the grace of God given to men irrespective of conscientious conviction, and is, in every direction but one, growing more manifest day by day. That exception, they say, lies in Anglicanism itself, which they affirm, adopting the Bishop of Winchester's conditional admission above in an affirmative sense, is in truth "the most schismatical body in the world," since it alone, with the exception of the Church of Rome (and without the special historical plea of that Church in justification), and one or two obscure sects of the Plymouth Brethren description, refuses as a whole any practical manifestation in the sight of men of that Unity which the Lord and His Apostles held so dear. In fine, they affirm that there is no real breach of unity, and is in fact felt to be none, amongst different denominations who on fit occasions work together, exchange pulpits, and meet and regard each other as brethren; but that there is sin and schism, and division of the visible Body of Christ, on the part of any who stand apart and deny to other godly Christians such recognition, much more who apply to them injurious language or epithets.

This view also may be illustrated in the occurrences and correspondence cited above. Canon Wilberforce himself, in his reply to the Bishop, though in many points he is a recognised exponent of what are called High

Church principles, to a certain extent endorses the Nonconformist view as to Christian Unity. He supposes the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, and asks if the "Church" which He would recognise and call to Himself, would be in any degree coterminous with the Church of England, or would not be rather gathered from all united by faith to Him? And he then says:—

"If this would be true in the event of the archangel's trumpet sounding to-morrow, it must have been true upon that Sunday night when I was preaching in the Albion Chapel; and if I refuse to recognise it, and consider many of His own to be outside the pale of His Body because they walk not with us, while they cast out devils in His name, and are doing, and doing well, half the Christian work of this country, it is I, and not they, who are guilty of the sin of schism."

"Allowing to the uttermost all the advantages to be derived from the fact that the Church of England is 'indeed the ancient Church of the nation come down in a continuous stream from the fountain head,' it is nevertheless true that the soul of man has not to wander eighteen centuries back to find the thrilling touch, the close guidance, and the all-surrounding love of the personal Lord Jesus Christ; and if I refuse fellowship with believers in Christ who are living in vital union with their risen Lord, because they do not see eye to eye with me upon questions of apostolic order, I am grieving the Spirit, marring the secret unity of the Body, and rending the seamless robe."

Pointing then to this episode, and to many such on record, Nonconformists affirm that there is no schism on their part, but that in countless ways (as on this occasion by going in a body to partake of the Lord's Supper at Canon Wilberforce's hands) they have tried to manifest, and so far as lay in them did manifest, to men, the Unity of the Body: but they ask if the Church of England has done the same, or manifested by its action any Unity, of any sort at all which the world can judge of? They admit that Episcopal views must of necessity affect reciprocity; as, e.g., in this case, no conscientious Episcopalian could go to receive the Lord's Supper at unconsecrated hands. All such distinctions and limits they understand and respect. But when such action as the Canon did take is protested against, and the same position is taken in other ways, they say that it is the Anglican Church, and not they, who are breaking the Unity of the Body of Christ.

It hardly needs mentioning, that there are varieties and degrees of each view. Thus, even above we find Canon Wilberforce in part adopting that of those who, in all points of detail, differ from him widely; and there are Nonconformists who more or less incline towards Anglican views. But in their real and essential nature the opposite views are as above; and while there is such profound difference of opinion, the bounden duty of each is to exhibit the utmost personal kindness and Christian fellowship consonant with his own conscientious convictions. The Bishop of Winchester's letters above quoted, it is well to remark, furnish very strong evidence of place in the eleventh or twelfth centuries, but earlier schools of the nature of universities were founded at Alexandria and Antioch in the fourth century [ALEXANDRIA, CATECHETICAL SCHOOL OF], and became exceedingly famous under Pantœnus, Clement, and Origen. "How great must have been the reputation and influence of such schools when they were but few in numbers and when oral instruction was nearly the only path to knowledge; how great the noble pride of the professors and the enthusiasm of the scholars when, from all the countries of Europe, learners flocked to spend long years in Bologna and Paris that they might share in this instruction." [Mullinger, p. 71.]

The earliest of this kind of European school, the histories of which can be historically traced, are those of Bologna, Paris, and Salerno: the first, the great school of civil law; the second, of "arts" and theology; the third, of medicine. But although these "schools" were originally distinct, those who wanted to perfect themselves in each branch of learning going successively to the "school" where it was specially taught, just as in modern times a man would sometimes go to Cambridge for mathematics and to Oxford for logic and classics, graduating perhaps at both universities—each "school" gradually incorporated with its own particular study the branches of learning which were taught at the others. Thus a school of arts and medicine was founded at Bologna in 1316, and in the latter half of the same century a school of theology was founded by Pope Innocent VI. The name is preserved at Oxford, where the Lecture and Examination Halls are still called "The Schools," and where the studies of the several branches of university learning are named "The School of Theology," the "School of Arts," etc.

But the University or "School" of Paris was that which had most influence in Europe during the early revival of learning, and upon its model Oxford and Cambridge, and all the other great universities of Europe, appear to have been established. It was distinctly ecclesiastical in its associations, and tradition points to the Church of St. Geneviève as the place of its origin; and it was in Paris that the particular studies which had been previously carried out in separate "schools" were first combined under the name of "universities," a term originally applied to any corporation, but in this case taking the sense of such a combination or incorporation of various branches of learning, that the whole body might fairly be called a place of universal learning. It was in Paris that university degrees originated, the "degree" being originally a licence to teach under the title of "Doctor," as a Doctor of Theology, a Doctor of Civil Law, or a Doctor of Medicine. At Paris also originated the division of students into "nations," which were four in number—the "French Nation," which included Spaniards, Italians, and Greeks; the "Picard Nation" which included students from the North-East and from the Netherlands; the "Norman Nation;" and the "English Nation," which included Irish, Scottish, and German students.

Many Continental universities were formed in the thirteenth century by the dispersion of students from Bologna and Paris through civil discords. Thus arose those of Montpellier, Toulouse, Padua, Vicenza, Pisa, Vercelli, Arezzo, and Ferrara. To the same period and the same cause may be attributed the great increase and development of the two great Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. [OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF; CAMBRIDGE, UNIVERSITY OF.]

Unleavened Bread.—There was a great dispute in the Middle Ages between the Schoolmen and the Greeks as to what kind of bread should be used at the Eucharist; the Greeks called the Latins Azymites, for consecrating in azymus, i.e. unleavened bread; and the Latins charged the Greeks with deviating from the example of Christ and the practice of the ancient Church by using leavened bread. Our Saviour doubtless used unleavened bread when He celebrated His last supper, but it was at the time of the Passover, when none other was to be had; and from the following arguments it will be seen that the early Church always used common bread: [1] The elements were usually taken out of the oblations of the people, where doubtless common bread and wine were offered. [2] It is noted by Epiphanius, as a peculiar rule of the Ebionite heretics, that they celebrated in unleavened bread and water only, which argues that the Church did otherwise. [3] The ancients say expressly that their bread was common bread, such as they made for their own use upon other occasions. [4] The ancients are wholly silent as to the use of unleavened bread in the Church, but they many times spake of leavened bread, and sometimes the Eucharist is spoken of as fermentum, i.e. leaven. [5] It is observable that neither Photius nor any other Greek writer before Michael Cerularius, A.D. 1051, ever objected to the use of leavened bread in the Roman Church, which argues that the use of unleavened bread did not prevail till about that time, else there is no doubt that Photius would, among other things, have objected to this. These arguments put the matter beyond all dispute, that the Church for a thousand years used no other than common or leavened bread in the Eucharist, but how or exactly when the change was made it is not easy to determine. The first Common Prayer Book of Edward VI. enjoins that unleavened bread be used in the Holy Communion throughout the whole kingdom; it was ordered to be round, in imitation of the wafers used by the Greek and which he taught at Montpellier and Avignon. He was then made Abbot of St. Victor of Marseilles, and in 1362 chosen Pope in succession to Innocent VI. He took up his residence at Avignon, and one of his first acts was to excommunicate Bernabo Visconti, the tyrant of Milan, who had seized some cities belonging to the Papal States, and having defeated him, Italy for a time enjoyed some peace. The Pope then went to reside at Rome in 1367, where he was received with acclamation; but the city was in a miserable condition, and the surrounding country a prey to incessant internal dissensions. These he tried, with the help of Joanna, Queen of Naples, to suppress; but, finding the task beyond his powers, he determined, in 1370, to return to Avignon, where he died almost immediately on his arrival.

URBAN VI., Pope from 1378–1389. An account of him will be found in the article PAPAL SCHISM [q.v.].

URBAN VII., a native of Rome, Cardinal of St. Marcel, and famous for his learning. He had held important posts under Paul IV., Pius IV., Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Sixtus V., and on the death of the latter, in 1590, was unanimously chosen to succeed him, but he died before his consecration.

URBAN VIII., Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, was chosen Pope in 1623, after Gregory XV. He was a native of Florence, and studied in Rome and Bologna under the Jesuits, and held various offices under several Popes. He aimed at the temporal rather than the spiritual prosperity of the Papacy; he was a lover of learning and a patron of learned men. In 1624 he concluded the wars about the Valtellina, which had become an intricate political question between the Courts of Rome, France, Spain, Austria, and Savoy; he declared that the Commonwealth of Venice was to be treated as a crowned head; in 1626 he re-annexed the Duchy of Urbino to the patrimony of the Church without the aid of arms; he also settled the dispute about the succession of the Duchy of Mantua. In his time began the long conflict known as the Thirty Years' War and also the earlier stages of the great Jansenist controversy. He supported Richelieu and France against Austria and Spain in a war which broke out in Italy in 1635. In 1642 the Papal State itself became the scene of petty warfare. The nephews of the Pope (the Barberini) persuaded their uncle to take military possession of the Duchy of Castro, then held by Odoardo Farnese, Duke of Parma; Farnese, aided by the Duke of Modena and the Republic of Venice, marched an army across the Papal frontier, and bore all before him, and in 1643 the Pope was obliged to give back Castro. The disappointment of his schemes is said to have hastened his death; he died in 1644. He composed some hymns and several pieces of Latin and Italian verse. He instituted a new order of

*Knights, The Conception of Our Lady, the first of which were Charles Gonzago, and Uladislav IV. of Poland. He canonised Ignatius Loyola and St. Philip Neri. In his pontificate happened the trial of GALILEO [q.v.], and also that of Centini, a nephew of Cardinal Centini of Ascoli, who joined with several dissatisfied men bent on destroying the Pontiff, and had recourse to magical arts to effect his purpose. He intended to murder Urban, and then to place his uncle, the Cardinal, on the Papal throne. The plot was, however, discovered, and as the judges themselves believed implicitly in the virtue of magic, the crime was made capital. Centini was beheaded, others of the conspirators were burned, and the rest were sent to the galleys. Urban founded the College of the Propaganda, enlarged the Quirinal Palace, and enriched the library of the Vatican.

Urbi et Orbi.—A phrase applied to Papal rescripts which, having been issued by proclamation in the Piazza of the Campo di Fiore, are affixed to the gates of the Vatican, and so published "to the city and the world."

Ursinus, ZACHARY.—One of the most eminent divines of the sixteenth century [b. at Breslau in Silesia, 1534; d. at Neustadt, 1583]. He was educated at Wittenberg, and here made the acquaintance of Melancthon, who entertained a great friendship for him, and took him to the Conference at Worms in 1557, from whence he went to Geneva and thence to Paris, in order to learn the French language and perfect himself in Hebrew under the famous Jean Mercier. On his return to Breslau he wrote Theses de Sacramentis de Baptismo et de Cœnâ Domini, in which he took the side of Calvin and Melancthon, but he so managed the subject of Cœnâ Domini that the leading party in the town accused him of being a Sacramentarian. He endeavoured to justify himself, but, not giving satisfaction, he chose rather to quit his country than continue a quarrel, and, his friend Melancthon being now dead, he went to Zürich, where he fraternised with Peter Martyr, Bullinger, etc. In 1561 he was invited by the University of Heidelberg to settle there in their "Collegium Sapientiæ," and they made him their Professor "Locorum Communium," a chair which he held till 1568. In 1564 Ursinus, with Olevianus, drew up the Palatinate or Heidelberg Catechism, and at the instance of the Elector, Frederick III., wrote a defence of it against the attacks of Flacius Illyricus and other rigid Lutherans. The Elector was accused of having set forth a doctrine concerning the Eucharist which the Augsburg Confession had condemned, so he ordered Ursinus to write a Tract explaining the Doctrine of the Sacraments. Ursinus was present at the Conference of Maulbronn, where he argued vigorously against the URQUIARIANS [q.v.]. On the death of Frederick III., in 1577, his son and founding Trinity College. He collected large funds, and the college was opened Jan. 9th, 1593. The first Provost was Walter Travers, who has obtained an unenviable notoriety as the opponent whom Hooker overthrew in controversy, but he was a learned as well as pious man. Among the first fellows were Hamilton and Fullerton already mentioned, and Daniel, afterwards Archbishop of Tuam, who translated the New Testament into Irish. To the new college Ussher was sent, now in his thirteenth year. He laboured hard at the learned tongues, but from the first his attention was given chiefly to history and chronology, and he drew up a chronology of Old Testament history as far as the Book of Kings, differing little from that which he put forth as the result of his maturer study. He was also led, through the faltering and conflicting views of his mother's family, to study the Roman controversy, and from his twentieth year, when he took his M.A. degree, to his thirty-eighth, his biographers tell us that no day passed without his studying the Fathers, from the Apostles' time down to the Schoolmen of the thirteenth century. But he had already made his mark as an active controversialist. In his nineteenth year he accepted the challenge of a Jesuit, Fitz-Symonds, to a public disputation, and is said to have completely discomfited him. In due course he was ordained, and at once made his mark as a preacher, and before long was appointed Professor of Divinity in the University. Some officers in the army subscribed a very large sum for a present of books to the University, and Ussher was appointed, with a Dr. Challoner, whose only child, Phœbe, he afterwards married, to administer it. This led to his first visit to England, which from that time he repeated every third year, spending three months, one in Oxford, one in Cambridge, and one in London. Archbishop Loftus appointed him to a stall in the Cathedral which involved the pastoral care of the parish of Finglas, and whilst he pursued his learned studies, he was always once on Sunday in his parish pulpit. His work in drawing up the Irish articles in 1615 has been spoken of elsewhere. [IRELAND, CHURCH OF.]

During one of his visits to England, Ussher, who had been warmly recommended to King James by the Irish Government, had an interview with him, and the King was so impressed with him that, the Bishopric of Meath falling vacant, he appointed him in 1620. He is said to have shown himself powerful there in converting the Roman Catholics to Protestantism, and he published a tract on the religion of the ancient Irish to show how unlike it was to Romanism. In 1624 he was appointed to the Primacy of Ireland, the Archbishopric of Armagh. Not long after he converted the famous Earl of Peterborough to his faith.

The troubles between Charles I. and his Parliament brought heavy calamities on Ussher. He fearlessly urged Charles I. not to yield to the popular clamour by signing the warrant for Strafford's death, and when the unhappy King gave way Ussher was with Strafford to the very end. The Irish rebellion of 1641 laid the country waste; Ussher's house was plundered—only his books were saved to him. They were sent to him in England. His income was gone; he was even for a while left in want. He was with the King at Oxford in 1642, and his preaching is said to have been most moving. When the King had to leave Oxford, Ussher took refuge at Cardiff, until Lady Peterborough, in gratitude for the service he had done her, invited him to London. Some of the gentry round Cardiff subscribed for the money to convey him there, and sometimes at the London house of the Peterborough family, sometimes at their country residence at Reigate, he spent the rest of his life. He was studious as ever, and for eight years held the office of Preacher at Lincoln's Inn, but was at length compelled by bodily infirmity to resign. He still remained loyal to the unfortunate Charles, visiting him in the Isle of Wight, where he attempted to mediate between him and the Parliamentary Commissioners as to Church government. He proposed that the bishops should still be continued, but should not have independent authority, but should act in conjunction with their presbytery, that the archbishops should be moderators of provincial, and bishops of diocesan synods, and that the important business of provinces and dioceses should be transacted in these assemblies; but that nothing should be done against the direct will of the bishop. This has often been referred to as affording a possible means of uniting Episcopal and Presbyterian discipline. The Parliament were much inclined to it, but their power was gone; it had passed into the hands of Cromwell and his army.

Ussher laboured to the last. The day before his death he spent several hours in his study, then visited a sick person, discoursing, says his biographer, "for near an hour in so heavenly a manner as if, like Moses on Mount Pisgah, he had then a prospect of the celestial Canaan." He died in 1656, and by Cromwell's command was buried in Westminster Abbey, the Church Burial Service being allowed for the occasion.

His learning seems to have been amazing, especially in historical subjects. His chronology of the Scriptures, though modified by later discoveries, is still known as the "Received Chronology" which we have in our reference Bibles. His Antiquities of the British Churches, Treatise on the Religion of the Ancient British and Irish, Answer to a Jesuit, are all works of sterling value. He also wrote on the epistles of Polycarp and Ignatius, on the Samaritan Council of Trent. Ordination without office is also forbidden in the English Church.

Valentine, St.—One of the black-letter Saints in the English Prayer Book, whose name is celebrated on Feb. 14. During the persecution at Rome under Claudius II., he was very zealous in his attention to those condemned to martyrdom, and was in consequence arrested and at last sentenced to death. He was beheaded at Rome about the year 270. A church on the Ponte Mole at Rome was built by Pope Julius I. to his memory. "In our calendar," says Bishop Barry, "he is called a bishop, but this is probably an error." The habit of "choosing valentines" seems to have been a pagan custom, probably connected with the season of the year, and associated by pure accident with the Christian festival.

Valentinus, St.—One of the Christian preachers who in the fifth century went forth to labour in those countries where Arianism had taken strong hold on the minds of the people. We first hear of him in 440, when he appeared at Vindelicia, an important fort on the shore of the Danube. He managed, with the help of the few followers he had attracted, to build a rough church in the Tyrol. He spent his time in preaching to and advising all those who came to him, and found at last that his influence was making itself felt. He was joined by other disciples, among whom was SEVERINUS [q.v.]. He is said to have been Bishop of Passau.

Valentinus was an Egyptian heresiarch, who flourished under the Emperor Antoninus Pius. It is said that he quitted the Church because another man was preferred to a bishopric which he had hoped to gain. He afterwards visited Rome and abjured his errors, but soon relapsed. He died about A.D. 260.

The religious system of Valentinus was extremely fanciful. He taught that there was one eternal and supreme Deity, Bythos, the Abyss or Unfathomable One, who, after dwelling with Sige, or Silence, for numberless ages, manifested himself by sending forth a number of Æons. These Æons, whom he represented as male and female, were the personified attributes of the Supreme Deity, each being the revelation of some quality of Bythos. They were developed in pairs, of which the first were Nous, or Intelligence, and Aletheia, or Truth. From these sprang another pair, and from them again another. These six, with Bythos and Sige, formed the Ogdoad. From the Ogdoad were produced twenty-two other Æons, and the whole thirty constituted the Pleroma, or Fulness of the Deity.

The Æons decreased in rank and knowledge, and increased in imperfection in proportion to the distance of their descent from Bythos. Nous alone possessed a perfect knowledge of the Supreme One, and the burning desire of the inferior Æons to obtain this knowledge led to a Fall even within the limits of the Pleroma. To restore order Nous produced Christ and the Holy Ghost, who spread the knowledge of Bythos among the other Æons, and re-established peace.

During the struggle in the celestial world, Achamoth was born of Sophia, the last and most discontented of the Æons. Achamoth, being too imperfect to be received into the Pleroma, was cast out into Chaos, and there produced the Demiurge, or Creator, and elements of three kinds—viz. spiritual, animal, and material. Out of the elements the Demiurge constructed six regions, with six intelligences to govern them, in imitation of the celestial world, while he himself with Achamoth and the six intelligences constituted an Ogdoad, a distant imitation of the Ogdoad of the Pleroma. Man was formed by the Creator in His own image, without the spiritual element. This element was supplied by Achamoth without His knowledge, and, soon becoming apparent, roused the jealousy of the Demiurge, who forbade man to taste of the tree of knowledge, and expelled him from the intermediate region to this terrestrial world for disobeying His command.

Man growing degenerate, redemption became necessary, and the Æons combined to provide a Redeemer, each contributing something to produce the Æon Jesus, who was to be to mankind what Christ was to the Pleroma. Jesus was only apparently born of the Virgin Mary, and hence had nothing material about Him, but was formed of the spiritual and animal elements alone. The Christ of the Pleroma descended on Him at His Baptism, and left Him before the Crucifixion.

Valentinus held that men were of three classes, corresponding to the three kinds of elements—spiritual, animal, and material. The spiritual, no matter what lives they might lead, were to be united with Christ, as Jesus was, and finally received into the Pleroma; the animal men could not aspire so high, though they might, if they lived virtuously, be translated to happiness in the region of the Demiurge, but those of them who lived wickedly were to be included with the material men; these last were doomed to inevitable annihilation, however virtuously they might live.

Valentinus received the Scriptures, but interpreted them in his own way. He acknowledged as canonical many apocryphal writings which could be made to support his views. His works have not come down to us, but an account of his system is given by Irenæus.

The sect of the Valentinians spread widely. Their doctrine of the infallible salvation of spiritual men led many of them to practise all kinds of immoralities, which were doubtless the foundation for many of the charges against the early Christians.

as certa, the spirit, and the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one." But the words in italics are not found in any Greek MS. older than the fifteenth century; and though many of the Latin versions have the words, even the best of these omit it. All critics, therefore, have come to the conclusion that the words are not genuine.

Much controversy has been spent upon the last chapter of St. Mark's Gospel, verses 9-20. Some ancient MSS. omit these verses, and it is undoubted that the style is unlike the rest of the Gospel. The Dean of Chichester, Dr. Burgon, has written a volume on this subject full of learning and of keen critical power, and has gone a great way towards establishing the genuineness.

The narrative of the woman taken in adultery [John vii. 53-viii. 11] is absent from most of the ancient MSS., and the general conclusion is that it is an authentic history preserved by the tradition of the Church, but not part of the original Gospel of St. John.

In John v. these words—waiting for the moving of the water, for an angel went down at a certain season into the pool and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had—are not in most of the old MSS. The Revised Version omits them, but places them in the margin.

In Acts xx. 28, "the flock of God which He hath purchased with His own blood," there are several variations—"the flock of the Lord," "the flock of Christ." The Revisers have probably done well to retain the received version.

Acts xi. 20.—The Authorized Version reads "spake unto the Grecians;" the Revisers have "unto the Greeks." The MS. authority is evenly balanced, but the ancient versions and the general context favour the latter reading. The point is an interesting one, for the reason that if "Greeks" be the right reading, we must conclude that the persecution which followed St. Stephen's death led to the preaching to heathens, very possibly in anticipation of St. Peter's conversion of Cornelius. [See note in Bishop Ellicott's Commentary.]

1 Tim. iii. 16. "God was manifest." The Revised Version reads "He who was manifest," and the margin gives a third reading, "which was manifested." The variation will be understood if we give the Greek equivalent. ΘΣ stands for Theos, "God," ΟΣ for He, "He who," and Ο for "which." For the first of these readings there is no manuscript authority older than the ninth century, and only one ancient version—namely, the Slavonic. Therefore the probability is against this reading. Between the other two there is great difficulty. The Latin version favours the neuter, the Gothic the masculine. The masculine is the more difficult, because there is no clearly expressed antecedent, and for that reason is to be preferred. Moreover, ΟΣ is more likely than Ο to be changed into ΘΣ. The Revisers, therefore, have adopted the most probable reading for their textual authority.

Vatican, PALACE OF THE.—The residence of the Pope, called by this name, is the largest palace of modern Rome, and takes its name from the Vatican Hill upon which it stands. It is an irregular group of buildings, containing twenty-two courtyards and an immense number of rooms, estimated at from 4,500 to 16,000, and built at different periods. An Etruscan temple is said to have stood on the site, which gave rise to the name Vatican, from vetes, "a prophet." The first palace of the Vatican is reported to have been built by Symmachus about the beginning of the sixth century, and to have been occupied by Charlemagne during his residence in Rome: it was rebuilt and enlarged in the twelfth century. It was first used as the Papal residence after the healing of the great schism, as being convenient from its nearness to the castle of St. Angelo, the two buildings were connected by Pope John XXIII., and the palace was enlarged and beautified from time to time by his successors. Nicolas V. [1447-1455] began the "Tor di Borgia," which was completed by Alexander VI. [1492-1503]; the Sistine Chapel was built in 1473, and the Belvedere, formerly a garden-house, in 1490. The part now used as the Pope's residence was finished at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The Sistine Chapel is adorned on the walls and ceiling by the famous frescoes of Michael Angelo, and the stanzas and loggie are ornamented with paintings by Raphael. The Vatican contains other very famous paintings by Raphael, Titian, Domenichino, etc., but they are few in number. The Vatican Library is the finest in the world, containing nearly 25,000 MSS. and about 60,000 volumes. The most valuable of the MSS. is the Codex Vaticanus, which reaches back to the fourth century, and is a little older than the Codex Sinaiticus. It contains the LXX. version of the Old Testament with very few omissions, and all the New Testament as far as Hebrews ix. 14.

Vatican Council.—The last General Council of the Roman Church. It was convened by Pope Pius IX. by an Encyclical Letter, June 26th, 1868, to discuss Papal Infallibility and to condemn Rationalism and Liberalism. The Council was opened Dec. 5th, 1869. There were 719 members present, the numbers afterwards rising to 764—the largest number that has been reached since the Second Lateran Council of 1139. "All bishops of the Churches of Oriental rite not in communion with the Apostolic See," and all "Protestants and Non-Catholics" were invited to attend, in order, as Cardinal Manning says, that they might be referred to distinction between grave and light sins in many cases must rest solely on the judgment of God, and cannot be judged of by man. [MORTAL SIN.]

Veni, Creator Spiritus.—An ancient hymn generally supposed to be the composition of St. Ambrose, but more probably by Rabanus Maurus, poet to Charlemagne, in use in the Church at Whitsuntide from early times. From the year 1100 it has formed a part of the service for the consecration of bishops, and some hundred years or so later was inserted in that for the ordination of priests. It was translated as it stands in our Prayer Book in King Edward VI.'s reign. The Lutheran Church has also adopted it very generally for services at certain stated times.

Venite, exultemus.—The heading of the 95th Psalm, which opens the second part of Morning Prayer—that of praise. It has also been called, from the spirit that runs all through it, the Invitatory Psalm. Its fitness for its position was recognised as early as the days of Chrysostom, for then, every day after penitent confession, the 95th Psalm was sung. In the English Church it is ordered by the rubric to be sung every day, except Easter Day and on the 19th day of the month, when it comes in the regular course of the Psalms.

Venn, HENRY [b. at Barnes, Surrey, in 1724; d. 1797].—A leader in the Evangelical movement of the last century. He was educated at Cambridge. After his ordination he held several curacies, and was Vicar of Huddersfield, and afterwards of Yelling in Huntingdonshire, where he died. During the first years of his ministry he had a hard battle to fight against the indifference shown by all classes to religion; but he worked untiringly, and afterwards, in conjunction with Whitfield, one of his nearest friends, was among the chief movers in the Evangelical revival. The improvement wrought by him, especially in the town of Huddersfield, was most striking. He wrote The Complete Duty of Man, to counteract the effect of the Whole Duty of Man, which he and Whitfield held to be too formal. His children's children bore an honoured name in the Church.

Verger.—Supposed to be derived from the Latin word virga, "a twig." The name is given to the officers of the cathedral who carry the mace, or virge, before the clerical dignitaries.

Veronica, St.—A legendary saint whose story was from very early times introduced into that of our Lord's Passion, but has been rejected since the eleventh century. It is said that, as our Saviour passed by on His way to Calvary, bearing the cross, a woman was moved with compassion, and stepped forward and wiped the blood and sweat from His face with her veil; after which, she discovered the impression of His face remaining upon the linen. The portrait was called vera icon, "the true image," and in course of time the name, altered to Veronica, was transferred to the woman herself. Stories were afterwards invented concerning her life: some said she was the daughter of King Herod, and was converted from the love of the world to the love of Christ by witnessing His sufferings; while others identify her with the woman who had been healed of an issue of blood. The cloth with the miraculous image is said to be preserved at St. Peter's at Rome, and is exhibited among its relics; but other images, each declared to be the vera icon, are exhibited at different places.

Verse.—A term applied in Church music to that part of an anthem, or hymn, which is sung as a solo, or by a part of the choir only; to distinguish it from those parts which are sung as a full chorus by the whole choir.

Versicles.—Short sentences occurring in various parts of the Prayer Book, appointed to be said by priest and people alternately; as, for example:

Min.: O Lord, shew Thy mercy upon us.
People: And grant us Thy salvation.

Very God of Very God.—The word "very" in theological language signifies "real," "true," "indisputable." Thus in the second Article Our Lord is called "The Very and Eternal God," and in the Athanasian Creed "Very God and Very Man." And Latimer says, "Believe steadfastly that He was a very natural man, sin only excepted." The doctrine expressed in the phrase of the Nicene Creed is that Our Lord is Himself perfect God, and is begotten of perfect God, the word "of" not expressing the possessive case nor a mere superlative like "heart of hearts," but signifying "out of" or "from."

Vestments.—There have been two theories as to the origin of Christian vestments: one is, that they are derived from those used by the Jewish priests; the other, that they have their origin in the ordinary dress worn in early Christian times. The first view is now seldom accepted. Some of the chief Jewish garments were not known in the Christian Church. Thus no distinctive head-dress was worn for the first thousand years, and the girdle was not known till the eighth century. On the other hand, the chasuble, the chief Christian vestment, was unknown among the Jews. Also their garments were of many different colours, while in the primitive Christian Church white only was worn. The second view seems much more tenable. The three vestments mentioned at the Fourth Council of Toledo [633] cheeks to the chin, with large eyes, and a diadem of white hair. He tottered under the pressure of the crowd who came eagerly forward to touch him. I do not think I ever heard him pronounce the name of God without his voice being interrupted and broken by his tears."

A movement almost immediately followed his death to procure his canonisation, it being asserted that miracles were being wrought at his tomb. "Putting these aside," says a Protestant writer, "there remains abundant matter, free from all doubt and cavil, to command our admiration, and almost awe, in such an existence passed among ourselves in the middle of the nineteenth century. Forty years of such labours, devotion, privations, fervent sanctity, and holiness of life passed in determined and voluntary obscurity, and total forgetfulness of everything that is worldly, sensual, or selfish, is surely an example well worth dwelling on and considering, were it only for its startling contrast with everything around it. When considered as apart from a system, and as an individual fact, it is certainly a bright example, worthy of the deepest admiration and respect. It may very possibly be mixed up with much one might wish away from it; there may be some weak points visible in the confessor himself, and far more among those who often, it may be conjectured, from vain, morbid, restless, or even merely inquisitive feelings, flocked to him. But the great fact of the pious, devoted, humble, and self-denying life stands out boldly far above all suspicions, which in truth one is ashamed to dwell on in such a case, and leaves the obscure Curé of Ars a true saint of these latter days, in the best and highest signification of the term—a saint of whom any Church may well be proud, and of the like of whom no true Church can pretend to be above desiring to be the mother."

Viaticum.—The provision made for a journey. The term was applied in the early Church to Baptism and the Holy Communion, "because," says Bingham, "they were equally esteemed men's necessary provision and proper armour, both to sustain and conduct them safely on their way in their passage through this world to eternal life." The term was afterwards confined to the Eucharist given to a person in immediate danger of death, and in that sense it is used several times in the canons of the Nicene Council.

Vicar, derived from vicarius, meaning representative or vicegerent. In England the name is applied to the parish priest of a particular standing; he is called the rector if he owns all the tithes of the parish; if he receives a part only, he is then called the vicar. The origin of vicars can be traced as far back as the reign of Henry IV., when a law was passed providing that they should be sufficiently endowed to perform Divine Service, inform the people, and keep hospitality. The incomes were for the most part derived from glebe land belonging to the parsonage—that which was most fruitful being, as a rule, kept as rectorial tithe, and the rest being handed over to vicarial. The system was by no means equally carried out, and that is the reason that the incomes in different places vary so much in value.

Vicar-Apostolical.—A name formerly given to a bishop or archbishop to whom the Pope gave authority to act upon his own responsibility, or to any ecclesiastic invested with power to exercise jurisdiction in some place where the resident priest was for some reason incapable of discharging his duties efficiently. In modern times vicars-apostolic are appointed to supply the place of bishops where no episcopate has been established or where the succession has been interrupted. There are at present over a hundred of such vicariates in existence.

Vicar-General.—An officer employed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other bishops to assist in such matters as ecclesiastical causes and visitations. His duties are much the same as those of the chancellor of a diocese.

Vicar of Christ.—A title now appropriated only by the Pope, but belonging in the days of the early Christian Church to bishops all over the world.

Vicarage.—The term was originally applied to the church and land, in fact, everything under the charge of the vicar of the parish; but latterly it has been confined to the house belonging to the living. In former times the vicarage was always under the patronage of the rector, but in James I.'s reign it was decided that under certain circumstances the patronage was in the hands of the manor, and sometimes in that of the bishop of the diocese.

Vicars-Choral.—In some cathedral foundations, the assistants of the dean and chapter, for the most part, though not always, in charge of the choir and the chancel. They have to provide for a sufficient number of choirmen, etc., being in their place for the proper performance of the daily services. In some of the old foundations they were practically synonymous with the minor canons. Lay members of the choir of mature age were sometimes called lay-vicars.

Victor, St., an African bishop, was raised to the See of Vita in the reign of Genseric, about 477. In 484 he was banished by the Emperor Hunerick, son of Genseric, on account of a book he had written against the Arian heresy then prevailing. It is uncertain where he went—some say to Constantinople, but it is highly probable that he remained in Africa, from the exact account that he gives of the African martyrs in the fifth century under the Arian kings. This work was divided into five books. Hunerick died about 490, and his nephew Gondebaud allowed the bishops to return to their sees; but they were all banished again at his death in 496 by his successor Thrasamond, who in 504 published an edict at the instigation of the Arian bishops, which forbade the consecration of any Catholic bishops in the room of those who might die. As many of them disobeyed this edict, 200 were banished to Sardinia. St. Victor, however, continued to consecrate Catholic pastors, and in 506 was sentenced to imprisonment for life at Carthage. On his journey thither the inhabitants of Ruspa asked him to consecrate Fulgentius to that See, which he did in spite of the anger and threats of those in charge of him. After spending a year in confinement at Carthage he was sent to Sardinia, and died there in 512. The exact day of his death is not known, but August 23rd is the day kept in memory of him. His history of the persecution was edited by Ruinart in 1694, and has been republished in Vienna in 1881.

Victor.—There were three Popes and two Anti-Popes of this name. VICTOR I. succeeded Eleutherius about 185; he was a native of Africa. In his time the dispute about keeping Easter ran high, and he showed great intolerance to those who did not agree with him. [EASTER, IRENEUS; QUARTODONCIANS.] He also excommunicated Theodotus for heresy. [THEODOTIANS.] He died in 201.

VICTOR II. succeeded Leo IX. in 1055. His name was Gebhard, Bishop of Eichstadt, and he was the chief adviser of the Emperor Henry III. Hildebrand, afterwards Gregory VII., was sent to Germany to beg the Emperor's consent to the nomination of Gebhard to the papedom. Henry would fain have kept his counsellor with him, and the Bishop himself was not anxious for the promotion, so he gave his consent very reluctantly. At Hildebrand's bidding, Victor engaged at the Council of Florence to pursue the reforming policy of his predecessor. During his short pontificate he held many councils and synods, as at Tours, Lyons, Rouen, Narbonne, the decrees of all of them being directed against simony and the marriage of priests. At the close of 1056 he was summoned to the deathbed of the Emperor, who confided his heir to Victor's charge; but the Pontiff died himself in 1057.

VICTOR III. succeeded Gregory VII. in 1086. His name was Desiderius, Abbot of Monte Casino, and he was so little anxious for the office that he allowed nearly a year to pass between his election and his consecration; almost immediately after this ceremony, he hurried back to his convent, and Rome was left in possession of the Anti-Pope Guibert and his partisans for nearly two

but the crusading fire had now burnt out, and nothing was done. The third object proposed was the reformation of manners and of ecclesiastical discipline, and a number of decrees regulating these were passed; also sentences of condemnation against the BEGHARDS and FRATICELLI [q.v.].

Vigil.—A word derived from the Latin vigilie, watches kept by the Roman soldiers during the night; hence, originally, watches kept in the Church by the early Christians during the night preceding a great festival. Vigils were kept at least till midnight before the feasts of martyrs, and those of Easter Eve and Christmas Eve were prolonged till cock-crow. At first the night was spent in prayer and hymns, but in course of time the keeping of vigils gave rise to scandals, and about the thirteenth century the practice was forbidden, or limited only to the midnight Mass before Christmas. The vigils of the greater festivals were always observed by fasting, and in the Middle Ages this was extended to the days before all holy days—a rule which has prevailed among Roman Catholics, with few exceptions, till the present day. In England the Roman Catholics are exempted from fasting on all vigils except those of the Assumption, St. Peter and St. Paul, and All Saints' Day, Pentecost, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Lawrence, and Christmas Day.

Vigilantius.—A priest of Gaul, living at the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth century; b. at Calagurris, a village in Commenges, in the south of Gaul. He was ordained at Barcelona in 395, and was sent by Paulinus of Nola with letters of recommendation to St. Jerome at Jerusalem, which resulted in a quarrel between himself and St. Jerome, and the departure of Vigilantius for Alexandria. Vigilantius condemned the worship of saints and relics as a revival of Paganism; he objected to monasticism, and denied that the state of celibacy is more acceptable to God than that of marriage; and he said that the use of candles in churches in the daytime is useless and indefensible. St. Jerome attacked these opinions in one of his letters and in an essay, Contra Vigilantium, written when the latter had returned to Gaul.

Vigilius.—Bishop of Tapsus, in Byzacene, of whose life nothing is known except that he was present at a Synod held at Carthage in 484, convened by Hunerick, King of the Vandals. Vigilius was the author of five books against Eutyches, formerly wrongly ascribed to Vigilius, Bishop of Trent. They are valuable as polemical works, but not of much account for historical purposes.

Vincent, Sr., a native of Saragossa, suffered martyrdom during the Diocletian persecution, Jan. 22nd, 304. He was educated by Valerius, Bishop of Saragossa, and by him ordained deacon. He was brought before Dacian, the Roman Governor of Tarragona, and sentenced to the most horrible tortures. Legend says that no cruelty practised on him by his tormentors could in the least shake his faith, or even abate his courage and calmness; that Dacian, enraged at his inability to vindicate the honour of his own gods, threw Vincent into a dungeon where no light could enter, and left him there to starve; but here, too, he was disappointed, for the first news he had from the dungeon was that it was filled with heavenly light, the saint's wounds all healed, and he walking about singing praises to his deliverer. Dacian directed that Vincent should be laid on a soft bed that he might gain strength to bear new torments; but the martyr's sufferings were now at an end, for the moment he was laid on the couch he expired with a calmness more like sleep than death. A church was built in his honour at Valencia, and St. Augustine says that in his days the feast of St. Vincent was celebrated wherever Christianity was planted.

Vincent de Paul, Sr. was born at Pouy, in Gascogne, on April 24th, 1576. He was educated by the Franciscans at Toulouse, and ordained priest in 1600. On a voyage which he made from Marseilles to Narbonne he was captured by corsairs and sold at Tunis. He belonged successively to three masters, the last of whom, a Savoyard renegade, he converted, and the master and servant escaped together and landed in France in 1607. He went for a short time to Rome, and was sent thence on a mission to the French Court, where he became almoner to Queen Marguerite de Valois. He did not remain at Court long, but became tutor in the family of Count Gondy. He at this time began to form the Confrérie de Charité, an association of women who nursed the sick and visited the poor. In 1619 he became, through Count Gondy, almoner-general of the galleys, and he seems to have had wonderful success in softening the stony hearts of the reprobates with whom he was brought into contact. It is said that once he offered himself, and was accepted, in place of one of the convicts who would have left his family in the utmost poverty. He founded other societies, as the Society of St. Borromeo, against begging in Burgundy [1623]; and a congregation called Priests of the Mission, which was confirmed by Pope Urban VIII. in 1632 under the name of LAZARISTS [q.v.] The members of the Confrérie de Charité were mostly married, so he instituted the Order of Filles de Charité, the members of which were not nuns, but after their novitiate they took vows for one year. This congregation soon spread all over Europe. St. Vincent died at St. Lazare, September 27th, 1660, was beatified in 1727, and canonised by Clement XII. on July 19th, 1737, on which day he is commemorated. He was not learned, but his sermons, though very simple, were affecting and impressive, and he is considered one of the most eminent saints of the modern Roman Catholic Church.

Vincent of Lerins, Sr.—A native of Gaul, and of noble extraction [b. at the latter end of the fourth century, d. in 450]. He spent some years in the army, but desiring to avoid the temptations of the world, he retired to the Monastery of Lerins, situated on an island not far from the coast of Lower Provence, where he spent the remainder of his life. After a course of monastic discipline he was admitted to the priesthood. In 434 he wrote a Commonitory against Heretics, in which he attacks principally the Nestorians, who had been condemned by the Council of Ephesus three years before. It was divided into two parts, the first of which remains entire, the second was lost during St. Vincent's lifetime, and he has left an abridgment of it. He signed himself "Peregrinus," and was at first accused of Semi-Pelagianism, for which accusation, however, there is no ground in his writings.

Vinet, ALEXANDRE RODOLPHE [b. 1797, d. 1847], was born and educated at Lausanne. He was ordained a minister of the Swiss Protestant Church in 1819, holding besides his cure the Chair of Professor of Theology at the University of Basle. He was obliged to resign both in 1840 on account of being unable to agree with the union which existed between the Church and the State, the Church being, as he considered, completely subservient to the State. At the same time he explained most fully to his friends and parishioners that by this act he did not consider himself in any way severed from his National Church, which he held to be perfectly sound in doctrine, and to which he was firmly attached. All this time he seems to have been privately engaged by the University to give lessons in French literature, of which he was particularly fond, and which he had studied carefully for years. In 1845 he formed an assembly of all those who, like himself, had seceded from the National Church, under the name of the Constitution of the Free Church of Vaud. His works are partly theological, partly historical—the latter being mostly on the history of French language and literature. A great many of them have been translated into English. His theology is entirely such as is known by the word "Evangelical," insisting strongly on the necessity of repentance and salvation by faith. His basis of belief is the subjective, that the Divine origin of Christianity is proved by its fitness to meet the deepest needs of the human heart. He denies the need of any priestly character in the minister, who is simply a Christian commissioned by his brother Christians to carry out their views, but possessing only such authority as his study and practice give him.

Virgilius, Sr., Bishop of Salzburg, was born of noble parents in Ireland, went to France, and became a great favourite in King Pepin's Court. He went thence to Bavaria, and was, either in 744 or in 746, made Bishop of Salzburg. He was strongly opposed to St. Boniface, who twice complained of the Bishop to Pope Zachary, accusing him of heresy. The Pope, however, decided in favour of Virgilius. He built a church, which he dedicated to St. Rupert, his predecessor, converted the Carinthians, and died at Salzburg in 784. He was canonised by Gregory IX. in 1233, and is commemorated on November 27th.

Virgilius, Sr., Bishop of Arles, was born in Aquitaine about the middle of the sixth century. His parents were most anxious that he should receive a sound Christian education, and sent him to the Monastery of Lerins, one of the most famous in France at that time. He was there for some years, and then sent to superintend the Monastery of Arles in Burgundy. He there gained such a good name, both for his learning and piety, that on the death of Licerius, Bishop of Arles, in 561, he was appointed to succeed him. In 590 Gregory the Great became Pope. He appears to have held Virgilius in great veneration, and in 595 sent him the palm—a great mark of distinction, and also appointed him his Vicar in the Gallican Church—what meant the Church in the kingdoms of Burgundy and Austrasia. Virgilius died in 611, and was buried in his cathedral at Arles.

Vision.—By this word we understand the supernatural representation of an object to a man when waking. Thus Isaiah was visioning in the temple when he saw a vision of the Lord seated upon His throne [Isaiah vi. 1]. And Cornelius was praying in his house in open day when he saw the vision of the angel. The frequent mentions of visions in Holy Scripture, as also the prophecy that they should be made means of God's revelation of His will to men under the Christian dispensation, prepares us for the fact that many visions are recorded in ecclesiastical history, which, however we may choose to account for them, whether by supernatural revelation or by the strength of fancy, have, in some cases, had a very marked and unmistakable effect. Thus the beautiful story of Cadmon tells how this first of English poets was a servant in the monastery of Whitby, knowing nothing of literature or song, that he retired from the table when the harp came round to him but because he had no skill with it, that the vision of an angel appeared to him and bade him sing the beginning of created things, whereupon he burst out into his song of the Creation, which is one of the noblest pieces of our ancient literature.

The vision of St. Boniface is another very charming story. Dissatisfied with the progress of his companions, he used to wander off an evening among the lime-trees or to protect himself before the crucifix in his cell, when he frequently heard a voice which followed him about and bade him go to preach the Gospel. One day whilst listening to this voice, and wondering how he should obey it, he saw stretching out before him the German flag from which his race had come, and so strong was the vision upon him that he passionately sought means to visit it and fulfil his mission, and so went forth in 716 to labour to martyrdom.

His alleged visions of St. Catharine of Siena were manifold. At the early age of thirteen years she had a vision as of the open heavens, with Christ seated on a throne with Peter, St. Paul, and St. John the Evangelist standing beside Him, and it is said that this determined her to lead a monastic life.

Long beset by terrible temptations and foul suggestions which she tried in vain to rid herself of, she went at midnight to the church and spent much time in prayer and fasting and purging of herself, and at length she was comforted by the visible presence of Christ, who came and talked with her and calmed her by His conversation. At Pisa, when portraying herself before an ancient crucifix, she is said to have received the STIGMATA [q.v.].

Three alleged appearances of St. Michael in visions at different times have had great influence; in the fifth century he is said to have appeared to a Bishop in a cave at Montecassiano, and to have directed that a church should be built there in his honour: this was done, and it became the object of pilgrimages in all parts of Europe. The second was in the sixth century, when Rome was almost desolated by the plague. St. Gregory was leading a procession through the streets singing litanies; on the third day St. Michael appeared to him at the top of Hadrian's tomb, sheathing his bloody sword as a sign that the pestilence was at an end; a church was built there in his honour, and the hill borne the name of St. Angelo ever since. The third was to Aubert, Bishop of Avranches, commanding him to repair to Mont Saint-michel and build a church there.

St. Francis of Assisi is said to have found his true vocation by means of a vision of a splendid room filled with jewels and arms all marked with a cross, and in the midst thereof of Christ, who said to him, "These are riches reserved for My servants, and the weapons wherewith I arm those who fight in My cause." His most extraordinary vision was in the cave of Monte Alverna; he had spent forty days in his solitary cell, passing his time in prayer and contemplation, when he beheld a seraph descending from above, standing between his six shining wings the figure of a man crucified. When the vision departed from him his hands, feet, and side bore the impress of the Saviour's wounds. This story has frequently been the subject of art.

St. Ignatius Loyola on his way to Rome turned aside from his companions to pray in a small chapel, and it is said that whilst he was thus engaged the Saviour appeared to him, bearing His Cross and strengthening His servant with encouraging words: Ego vobis Romæ propitius ero.

To his friend and disciple, Francis Xavier, frequent visions came in the slumber of the trials he was to encounter in his missionary labours, and made him yearn to make great sacrifices for the conversion of mankind, so that when the call to go and evangelise India and Japan came, it found him ready and anxious for the service.

The visions of Edward the Confessor are interesting as being portrayed in bas-reliefs in his chapel in Westminster Abbey. One is that of a demon dancing on the Danegelt which had been collected, on whose appearance the King restored the money to his subjects and abolished the tax. Another is the appearance of our Saviour at the altar in Westminster when Edward was partaking of the Eucharist. Others represent the Danish king drowned as he was about to make war on England, a fact which was revealed in a dream to Edward; and the vision of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, which was taken to predict the Norman invasion.

To St. Gregory the Great several visions of our Saviour are reported; one, when Gregory was celebrating Mass, Christ descending on the altar with the instruments of His passion; and another when Christ came in bodily presence to the supper-table of Gregory and revealed Himself, afterwards saying that He was the beggar on whom Gregory had had unwearied compassion before he became Pope.

In the foregoing instances we have referred to records which are enshrined in the Hagiology of the Roman Church, are read in her legends, and commemorated on painted windows, especially on the Continent. Similar stories, however, are not wanting outside that Church. The appearances of the devil, for example, to Luther and Bunyan, were to their imagination so real that we might well class them under the head of visions; and the story of the conversion of Colonel Gardiner may claim a like place. He had been a thorough reprobate, and was still living the life of one, when sitting alone one evening he suddenly saw an appearance of the Saviour dying on the Cross, who spoke to him and said, "I bore all this for thee, then how canst thou treat me so?" We may form our own ideas as to the explanation of the phenomenon, but there is no question as to the consequence. He flung himself upon his knees in an agony of penitence, and from that hour led a most strict and religious life. While some such stories may be regarded as apocryphal, others, well authenticated, remain wonderful and unexplained.

Void.—A parish is said to be void when it is destitute of a pastor or incumbent. When the incumbent holds several benefices which are incompatible, the voidance is de jure; if he dies or is deprived, it is de facto.

Vocation.—The Greek word so translated in Eph. iv. 1, but generally in the Authorised Version rendered "calling," is applied to the position of all Christian men. In the same sense it is used in the second Collect for Good Friday: "Receive our supplications and prayers, which we offer before Thee for all estates of men in Thy Holy Church, that every member of the same, in his vocation and ministry, may truly and godly serve Thee." In a more restricted sense the word is applied to the calling by Providence to special work in the Church—e.g. to the ministry of souls. Such calling, it is evident, must first of all be inward, springing from the love of Christ, the zeal after holiness, the promotion of God's glory, and the salvation of souls.

Volney, CONSTANTIN FRANÇOIS CHASSE-REUF, COMTE DE, author of several anti-Christian works [b. at Craon in Anjou, 1757; d. 1820].—He was educated at Angers and Paris, and studied at first for the law and afterwards for medicine; but he gave up both professions, and, in 1783, started on a four years' expedition to Egypt and Syria. On his return to France he published his Travels in Egypt and Syria, a trustworthy and accurate book, written in a lively and interesting style, which at once procured him a great reputation. In 1790 he was elected by his native district Deputy of the National Assembly, and took a prominent part in the politics of the next few years. He wrote, in 1791, Ruins, or Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires; and in 1793, Natural Law, or Catechism of the French Citizen, otherwise called Physical Principles of Morality. This was thoroughly anti-Christian, and an exposition of such a system of ethics as can be reared on the theory of Materialism. In 1793 Volney was imprisoned as a Royalist by Robespierre, and not liberated till the following year, when he was made Professor of History in the École Normale at Paris. In 1796 that school was suppressed, and he then went to the United States; but returned to France in 1798. He was soon after made a member of the Academy. Bonaparte wished him to be one of his colleagues in the Consulate, but he would only accept a seat in the Senate and the title of Count, together with the command of the Legion of Honour. But he made no secret of his dislike of Bonaparte's tyranny and want of principle, and the latter sneeringly called him an "idéologue." On the fall of Napoleon, Louis XVIII. made him a peer. In 1819 he published his latest work, The History of Samuel, the Inventor of the Sacredness of Kings, in which he treats the character of Samuel and the Hebrew Scriptures with equal freedom. Volney was a fast friend of the public liberties, and a fearless opponent of popular excesses. But he remained to the end of his life an enemy to all systems of religion.

Voltaire, FRANÇOIS MARIE AROUET DE, the most celebrated of infidel writers, was born at Chatenay, near Sceaux, in 1694. His father, François Arouet, was a notary of good repute; his mother belonged to a noble Poitevin family, and is said to have been of brilliant ability. She died, however, when her son was seven years old. The child was so feeble in constitution that, as in the case of Fontenelle, whose hundred years surpassed even Voltaire's long span, his life was long despaired of. He was educated by the Jesuits at the Collège Louis-le-Grand, and it is said that one of his tutors there, Father le Jay, predicted that he would be the Coryphæus of Deism in France. Between the staid temperament of his father, proper to a notary with many responsibilities, and the bold vivacious son, there was little sympathy, and before many years had passed the two were at open variance. His godfather, the Abbé Châteauneuf, introduced the young man into the gay and corrupt world of the Regency, where his sprightliness and skill in literary trifling made him a favourite. The celebrated Ninon de l'Enclos, now eighty years old, who had been a friend of his mother, and still preserved her wit and power of epigram, took him up, and on her death left him a legacy to buy books. His father, unhappy at the sight of the frivolity of the Court, and also at the reaction against it into sourness and Jansenist narrowness, persuaded Châteauneuf, who was now ambassador to Holland, to take his son with him, and accordingly, in 1713, the young man went to the Hague. Here he fell in love with a young countrywoman; the course did not run smooth, and the ambassador sent his godson back to Paris in displeasure. In 1715 Louis XIV. died, and next year the young Arouet was thrown into the Bastille on the charge of having written a pungent satire on the Regent d'Orleans, though he had nothing to do with it. Here he lay for nearly a year, and amused himself by sketching his epic poem the Henriade, and by writing the first of his dramas. The Regent, convinced of his innocence, at length released him, and he spent the next six years in Parisian society industriously engaged with his pen. In 1722 his father died, and he dropped the name of Arouet for that of Voltaire, which was an anagram from Arouet l[e] j[eune]. An incident at the house of the Duke of Sully led to a great change in his life. A noble at one of the gatherings there spoke to him contemptuously, and received back a sharp answer, which turned the laugh against him, whereupon the mean-spirited aristocrat caused conformity. In 1770 he applied to the Pope for the post of temporal father of the Order of Capuchins for the district of Gex, and through the influence of the Duchess of Choiseul received it. It was partly his love of farce and mischief which moved him to this miserable act, partly a desire to worry his foe the Bishop, to whom he wrote letters signed "Voltaire, Capucin indigne;" partly also a dread of personal harm. He had no desire, he said, to be burnt alive, and so conformed. There are other features of his history at this time which are pleasanter to think of. He generously exerted himself in favour of the Calas family, a case in which an unfortunate old man, Jean Calas, a Calvinist, was accused of murdering his son to prevent him becoming a Roman Catholic, and entirely against evidence was convicted and broken on the wheel. Voltaire received his family into protection, and never ceased to agitate until he had procured a reversal of the condemnation, and restored the children to their rights. His endeavours for justice on behalf of Sirven, of Lally, and of the English Admiral Byng, were in unison with that for the Calas household.

In 1778, when he was eighty-four years of age, he once more visited Paris, and was received with the wildest enthusiasm. But the excitement was more than he could bear. A fit of illness came on, and he asked for a reconciliation with the Church on the ground that he did not wish to be deprived of Christian burial. The Abbé Gauthier obtained from him a declaration that he would die in the Roman Catholic faith, and that he asked pardon of God and the Church for his sins. But he recovered, and transferred his thoughts from the Church to the stage, attending successive representations of his plays. A relapse came on, and he lay down on his bed to die. The accounts of his deathbed are contradictory. The Abbé Gauthier signed a paper stating that he was sent for at Voltaire's request, but found him too far gone to be confessed. He died May 30th, 1778. An order from the Bishop forbidding his Christian burial came too late, for on the strength of Gauthier's certificate the rites had been performed.

The works of Voltaire were published by Baudouin [1824-34] in ninety-seven volumes. The brilliancy and vivacity of his style will cause him to be read probably for ages to come, but he can only be regarded as a destroyer in the world of theology, though doubtless even destructives have at times their necessity and their use. He had no deep convictions, had little simplicity or sincerity of character, and none of his friendships seem to have been strong. The deep earnestness of Bossuet and Pascal and Massillon, their resolute grappling with the awful problems of life and death, of God and His relations to the universe, of suffering and

Voluntary.—The name given to the music played at the beginning or end of Divine Service and occasionally in other parts of the service; so called because this music formerly was mostly extemporaneous or voluntary.

Voluntary Controversy.—The name given to a controversy which arose in Scotland in 1829, and which began with a sermon preached by a minister named Marshall, a member of the United Secession Church in Kirkintilloch. He endeavoured to prove the unscriptural and unjust nature of the maintenance of Church establishments, the principle of which he declared to be the exertion of the civil authority to compel payment of the endowments of the clergy. He said that civil establishments of religion are condemned in the New Testament, and opposed in every way to the dictates of conscience and common sense. He and his followers took the name of the Voluntary Church Association, and started a periodical called The Voluntary Church Magazine. They were opposed first of all in the Edinburgh Christian Instructor; but as the matter went deeper, a rival association was formed, calling itself the Association for Promoting the Interests of the Church of Scotland, by which the Church of Scotland Magazine was started. Great interest was felt in the matter, and various able men took part in the controversy on both sides.

Vorstius, CONRAD.—An Arminian divine [b. at Cologne, in 1569; d. at Tönningen, in Schleswig, in 1622]. He studied at Düsseldorf, Cologne, and Heidelberg, and left the Roman Church to become a Protestant. At Heidelberg he was made a Doctor of Divinity, and lectured on theology at Basle, Geneva, and Steinfurt; and in 1610 he was called to succeed Arminius as Professor of Theology at Leyden. He soon became involved in theological controversy, and was accused at one time of Socinianism, while the Gomarists accused him of publishing heretical doctrines in his Tractatus Theologicus de Deo, which appeared in 1610. Vorstius was attacked as being the supposed author of a work called De Officio Christiani Hominis, which he disclaimed; but the suspicion with which he was regarded became so strong that he was condemned as a heretic by the Synod of Dort, and banished, first from Leyden, and finally from Holland. He returned secretly after some time, and remained concealed until his death.

Vossius or Voss, GERARD JOHANNES [b. near Heidelberg, 1577; d. at Amsterdam, 1649], studied at Dordrecht and Leyden, where he devoted himself chiefly to the study of theology, Hebrew, and ecclesiastical the principal mover in the work of reformation, and carried his arms with success against his heretical neighbours. He died in 1785, and was succeeded by his son Abd-ul-Azis, who followed in his steps and pushed his conquests all over Arabia. The Wahabees reached the height of their power at the beginning of the present century; when, in 1803, they became masters of Mecca, and in 1804 of Medina. They laid a yearly tribute on the Turks in return for the privilege of making pilgrimages to the sacred city. In 1808, while pressing on to the east coast of the Persian Gulf, they came into collision with Great Britain, and were severely defeated. In 1811 the Pasha of Egypt, Mahomet Ali, sent an expedition against them, and in 1812 and 1813 recovered Medina and Mecca, and his adopted son, Ibrahim Pasha, in 1815 attacked them in their stronghold, central Arabia, and in 1818 captured their capital, Derajoh, and took their chief, Abdallah, prisoner to Constantinople, where he was beheaded. Their power was thus for a time crushed, but, according to the Eastern travellers Palgrave and Pelly, they are still very powerful in the peninsula. The former speaks of their empire as "a compact and well-organised government, where centralisation is fully understood and effectually carried out, and whose mainsprings and connecting links are force and fanaticism. Its atmosphere, to speak metaphorically, is sheer despotism—moral, intellectual, religious, and physical. . . . Its weakest point lies in family rivalries and feuds of succession, which, joined to the anti-Wahabian reaction existing far and wide throughout Arabia, may one day disintegrate and shatter the Nudjean empire, yet not destroy it altogether. But as long as Wahabism shall prevail in the centre and uplands of Arabia, small indeed are the hopes of civilisation, advancement, and national prosperity for the Arab race." Their political power is now confined to their native province, Nedjed, but they have missionaries and spies in many places north of that, and also on the coast of the Persian Gulf.

Wake [derived from an old Gothic word, wakan, "to watch"].—The people had been accustomed to hold wakes in honour of the heathen gods. When it became a recognised Christian use to dedicate churches to popular saints, the day on which such saints were commemorated came to be celebrated with great rejoicing. At first the congregation used to meet the night before, and watch (hence the name) all through the night; and in the morning, after a solemn service had been held, gave themselves up to feasting and rejoicing. In time the custom became abused, and the day was no longer treated as a religious festival. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was ordained that the wake should be kept in all parishes on the first Sunday in October, in the hopes of getting the day observed more quietly; but in spite of this the festivals fell into such bad repute that the Puritans made a vigorous effort to bring about their discontinuance. In 1627 one of the judges in Somersetshire ordered that no wake should be held henceforth, and the custom gradually died out, especially in the western counties. [Hymns, Book of.] In the north and midland counties they are still, though rarely, to be found. A lyke-wake, or liche-wake, is the watching of a dead body all night by the relatives or friends.

Wake, WILLIAM, D.D. Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1657, d. 1737], was educated at Oxford, and became successively Canon of Christ Church [1684], Dean of Exeter [1701], Bishop of Lincoln [1705], and Archbishop of Canterbury [1715]. He began his career as a divine with his Exposition of the Doctrines of the Church of England, an answer to Bossuet's recently published Exposition of the Roman Catholic Faith, and this led to a controversy in the course of which Wake published two more treatises. Pope Clement XI. is said to have regretted that so profound a theologian was not a member of his Church. In the earlier part of Wake's episcopate he belonged to the Low Church school, but he steadily became more conservative, as was shown by his sharp controversy with Hoadly, and by his votes in the House of Lords against the repeal of the Test and Corporation and the Occasional Conformity Acts. One of his most memorable works was his endeavour, in conjunction with Dupin, to bring about a union between the English and Gallican Churches, which, though it failed, has left a longing hope on the part of many Anglicans that it may even yet promote a reunion of Christendom. His English Version of the Genuine Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers is still regarded as a standard work in English divinity.

Wakefield, GILBERT, a distinguished scholar and critic, was the son of a clergyman, George Wakefield. He was born at Nottingham in 1756, died in London in 1801. He entered Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1772, and was elected a Fellow in 1776. The same year he published a volume of Latin poems, with some clever criticisms on Homer, which already gave promise of the brilliant scholarship for which he was afterwards famous. In 1778 he took deacon's orders and obtained a curacy first in Cheshire and afterwards near Liverpool. He was never ordained priest, for, before the year had expired, he had become so dissatisfied with the teaching and discipline of the Church of England that he resolved to leave it, and, in 1774, took the post of classical tutor in a Dissenting school at Warrington. While there he published A New Translation of the First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the

"Grubenheimer," because they used to hide themselves in caverns. These soon became amalgamated with the Hussites, though as they were not so advanced in view as the Taborites there was a good deal of delay. From them the Bohemian Brethren derived the consecration of their bishops. They found a safe retreat, fortified by nature, in the valleys of Western Piedmont, where they founded a distinct Church, which has remained till the present day the main centre of their sect. A correspondence which two of their pastors, Morel and Masson, had with Ecolampadius, in 1530, is preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, from which it appears that among the Waldenses there were sisterhoods bound by vows of celibacy, that the preachers received confessions, but resorted to the Catholic priesthood for the Sacraments. But now they resolved to abolish Confession, two Sacraments only were acknowledged, and the doctrine of Predestination was asserted. Their doctrines rest entirely on the Gospels, which, with some catechisms, they have in their old dialect, a mixture of French and Italian. In this language their worship was performed till 1630, when their old "barbes" or teachers became extinct. They then had recourse to Geneva to supply the vacancies, and ever since the French language has been used in their services, and teachers are sent from the Calvinistic colleges. The constitution of their congregations, which are chiefly employed in the cultivation of vineyards and the breeding of cattle, is republican. Each congregation is governed by a council, consisting of the elders and deacons, under the presidency of the pastor, which maintains the strictest discipline. The congregations are all united at the yearly synod. From their origin the Waldenses have been distinguished for their pure morals and industry, and have always been regarded as good subjects. After they had joined the Calvinists, in the sixteenth century, they were again exposed to the storm which was intended to sweep away the Reformation, the doctrines of which they had held practically for nearly three hundred years. This was the cause of their being expelled from France. Those who had settled in the duchy of Saluzzo were totally exterminated by 1633; and those in the other valleys, having received from the Court of Turin, in 1654, new assurances of religious freedom, were treacherously attacked, in 1655, by monks and soldiers, and shamefully treated. By the aid of other Protestant Powers they procured a new, though limited, promise of freedom by the Treaty of Pignerol, signed Aug. 18th, 1655, but the persecution, again brought about by French influence, obliged thousands to take refuge in Protestant countries: in London they joined the French Huguenots; in the Netherlands, the Walloons; in Berlin, the French; while nearly 2,000 went to Switzerland. They now enjoy religious freedom and all civil rights in Lucerne, St. Martin, and Perusa, where they number over 20,000, while there are about 1,600 settled in Würtemberg.

M. Montet has given a very thorough account of Waldensian literature, dividing it into three periods: [1] The Catholic period, during which the dogmas and practices of the Church were accepted. The writings of this period are taken from the Fathers and the Liturgies. The Pope during this period is never attacked, the Seven Sacraments and Transubstantiation are assumed, and ascetic views are strongly maintained. [2] The Hussite period. Now the Pope is fiercely attacked, the Sacraments are invalid by reason of the wickedness of the priests, and there is a strong leaning towards the Universal Priesthood. [3] The Calvinistic. Unhappily this last period has been marked by a wholesale falsification of documents, by forgery and by mutilation, with the object of showing that the Waldensian is a Christian body which had descended from Apostolic times, preserving their faith through the ages in primitive form. This fiction M. Montet has altogether destroyed, though, as he acknowledges, the late Mr. Henry Bradshaw had already discovered and exposed the real character of some of the documents adduced. Much kindness has been expended on the Waldenses by English, Scotch, and American sympathisers, and every year in the first week of September delegates from these countries attend the Synod, when not unfrequently a dispute arises between the United Presbyterians and the Free Kirk men. Much money, diverted from home charities, finds its way hither. A short time since the Waldensian inhabitants of Dormitrouse in Dauphiné were transported by mistaken kindness to Algeria, the result of which was that their bones were scattered, not on Alpine mountains, but on scorching African plains. The services are the very plainest and barest type of Genevan Protestantism; the minister taking the whole service and the people taking no share, except the occasional singing of a hymn.

Waldo, PETER, the alleged founder of the WALDENSES [q.v.], was born at Vaux, or Waldum, on the Rhone, early in the twelfth century. He made a large commercial fortune in Lyons. In 1170 he employed a priest to translate from Latin into French the Four Gospels, with other books of Holy Scripture, and the most remarkable sentences of the ancient doctors so much esteemed at that time. It was through the perusal of these books that he determined to lead a religious life, and, abandoning his mercantile pursuits, he distributed his riches among the poor, and formed an association with other pious men who adopted his sentiments, and then assumed the character of a public teacher and instructor of the multitude in the doctrines of Christianity. His opinions were condemned recently restored. There were many other Walloon settlements in different parts of England. At the present day weekly service in Dutch is conducted only at Austin Friars; at Norwich there is still a small sum left of church property, which is divided among a few poor descendants of Dutch settlers, and once a year the minister of Austin Friars goes there and holds a service in Dutch. In 1866 the land on which some almshouses of the Austin Friars Church were built was needed by the railway, and the almshouses were rebuilt at Old Charlton, Kent, and afford a home to ten members of the church. At the present time the congregation at Austin Friars varies from fifty to eighty persons. A very interesting account of the Church and its past history was published in 1885 by Mr. W. J. C. Moens.

Walpurgis or Walpurga, St., was born in England, but spent most of her time in Germany, assisting her brother, St. WILLIBALD [q.v.] and her uncle, St. BONIFACE [q.v.], in their missionary labours. About the middle of the eighth century she became the Abbess of a convent at Heidenheim, in Franconia. She is generally considered the authoress of a Latin description of the Travels of St. Willibald. She died about 777, and after her death many chapels were built in her honour. Of the origin of the curious legends and customs connected with the so-called Walpurgisnacht, April 30th, very little is known. It is said that May 1st was a very important day for the German farmer, who signs contracts and begins to arrange for the work of the summer. With a view to harassing him and doing him mischief, Satan and the witches were supposed to meet the night before on the Brocken and lay plans for his ruin. Hence the custom of burning straw in some parts of Germany on that night, which was supposed to have the power of dispersing all evil beings—a custom still, though very rarely, preserved.

Walstan, St., Confessor.—A saint of Norfolk, born of a rich family, who renounced his wealth at the age of twelve and became a farm-labourer at Taverham, near Cossey. He died May 30th, 1016, and was buried at his native place, Baber. Two wells in the neighbourhood bore his name and were the object of pilgrimages for the cure of palsies, lameness, and blindness. He died in a field, in the act of mowing, and was for a long time looked on in Norfolk as the patron saint of farm-labourers.

Walton, BRIAN, D.D., Bishop of Chester, born at Cleveland, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, in 1600. He was educated first at Oxford and then at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1623. He was ordained, and, while serving his first curacy, was also a schoolmaster in Suffolk; he then became Curate at All Hallows, Bread Street, and in 1626 was made Rector of St. Martin's Orgar in London and Sandon in Essex. About the same time he was appointed Chaplain to the King and made a Prebendary of St. Paul's. When the Puritans gained the upper-hand he was ejected from all his appointments, and fled to Oxford; while here he spent his time in collecting the materials for his celebrated Polyglot which has made his name famous. Several Polyglot Bibles had been published in foreign countries before Walton's, which appeared between the years 1654–57; but all critics allow that his is by far the most useful, and shows the greatest scholarship. It is supposed to be the first book printed in England by subscription. Nine languages are used in the course of the work, as many as seven being sometimes given in one page. On the Restoration he was made Chaplain to Charles II., and in September, 1661, was consecrated Bishop of Chester in Westminster Abbey, but died in the following November. Dr. Walton published, in 1655, as a help to the study of his Bible, an Introduction to Oriental Literature.

Walton, IZAAK, best known as "the Father of Angling," but also as a Christian biographer, was born in Stafford in 1593; died 1683. Little is known of him before his marriage, in 1626, to Rachel Floud, a descendant of Archbishop Cranmer. From her uncle, George Cranmer, who had been the pupil of RICHARD HOOKER [q.v.], he probably gained the material for his celebrated Life of Hooker. Walton's first literary effort was an elegy on his friend Dr. Donne, whose life he wrote as a preface to the volume of sermons published in 1640. Walton's "Lives" comprise those of Donne, Hooker, Sir Henry Wotton, George Herbert, and Sanderson Bishop of Lincoln. Walton's second wife was Anne Ken, half-sister to the celebrated Non-juring Bishop of Bath and Wells. He is buried in Winchester Cathedral, as, at the time of his death, he was residing with his son-in-law, Dr. Hawkins, Prebendary of Winchester. His greatest fame rests on his Complete Angler, or Contemplative Man's Recreation—a beautiful pastoral, breathing forth the love of the Creator and His works, and full of delightful descriptions of rural scenery.

Warburton, WILLIAM, Bishop of Gloucester, was born at Newark-upon-Trent, in 1698, died at Gloucester, 1779. He was the son of an attorney, and his father, wishing to train him in the same profession, apprenticed him, in 1714, to an attorney at East Markham. He was there five years, and then gained admittance in one of the courts at Westminster; but, having by this time come to the conclusion that his talents were not suited to the law, he gave it up, and in 1723 took deacon's orders. Two years later he Bishop Gauden to Worcester, he became Bishop of Exeter, from which See he was translated to that of Salisbury on the death of Bishop Hyde in 1667. In 1671 Charles II. made him Chancellor of the Order of the Garter. He was distinguished for his power as an orator, and for soundness of argument.

His chief theological works are: A Philosophical Essay towards an Eviction of the Being and Attributes of God, the Immortality of the Souls of Men, and the Truth and Authority of the Scripture, published in 1652; a volume of Sermons [1674], as Against the Resistance of Lawful Powers, Against the Anti-Scripturists, etc. His most celebrated writings, however, are astronomical.

Ward was a very munificent man; he gave a considerable sum of money towards making the river at Salisbury navigable to Christ Church in Hampshire; and in 1679 he bestowed £1,000 on Sydney College, Cambridge. In 1683 he built a hospital or college at Salisbury for the benefit of ten poor widows of clergymen, and the following year erected at his birthplace almshouses "for four ancient men and four ancient women who had lived well, but by misfortune brought to poverty."

Wardlaw, RALPH, D.D., Scottish divine [b. at Dalkeith, 1779; d. at Glasgow, 1853]. In 1791 he entered the University of Glasgow, and afterwards attended for five years the divinity lectures of the Secession Church, which decided him to become a minister of the Scottish Independent congregation. He began to preach in 1800, and a church having been built for him in Glasgow, he took charge of the congregation there in 1803, and continued to hold the office for more than fifty years. In 1811 he was elected Professor of Systematic Theology in the Theological Academy of the Scottish Congregationalists, then established in Glasgow, and this post also he held until his death. In 1833 he delivered a course of lectures in London in defence of Congregationalism, and was appointed in 1839 to appear in London to reply to some lectures, defending Church Establishments, delivered by Dr. Chalmers. Wardlaw wrote many controversial and theological works, remarkable for learning, vigour, and grace of style. The chief of these are Discourses on the Socinian Controversy; On the Nature and Extent of the Atonement of Christ; Christian Ethics; Congregational Independency; and numerous essays and discourses.

Warham, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Oakley, in Hampshire, about 1450, died at St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, in 1532. He was educated at Winchester, and afterwards at New College, where he obtained a Fellowship in 1475, and a few years later the degree of LL.D. He was ordained, and is supposed to have possessed some living; but he was for the most part employed in the business of the Court of Arches. He was a member of Sir Edward Poynings' mission to Burgundy, on the question of the support given by Margaret, the Dowager-Duchess, to Perkin Warbeck, and Bacon gives one of his speeches on this occasion in the life of Henry VII. He was in high favour with the King, and obtained promotion quickly—being Keeper of the Great Seal, Lord Chancellor, Bishop of London, and Archbishop of Canterbury, in the course of a very few years. When Henry VIII. came to the throne Warham was made to resign several offices in favour of Wolsey, a former pupil. This was partly because Warham had opposed the marriage of Henry, when Prince of Wales, with Catherine of Aragon, his brother's widow. He and the Cardinal were jealous of one another, and the question of rights—one being Archbishop and one Cardinal—was always arising. But Warham lived to see his rival disgraced, and was afterwards even again offered the Chancellorship, but declined it on account of his age and ill-health. He was a generous patron of Erasmus, who dedicated to him the collection of St. Jerome's works which he edited.

Warrants, Warranty.—A term used in the Thirty-nine Articles to signify a proof or security to the truth of a doctrine. Thus in Article VIII. it is written that "the Three Creeds . . . ought thoroughly to be received and believed: for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture;" while Article XXII. says that "The Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping and Adoration . . . is a fond thing, vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture."

Washburn, EDWARD ARIEL, D.D. [b. at Boston, Massachusetts, April, 1819; d. at New York, February, 1881]. studied at Andover and New Haven, and entered the Congregational ministry; but soon left this and became a clergyman in the Episcopal Church. From 1845 till 1861 he was Rector of St. Paul's, Newburyport; subsequently he travelled in Egypt, Palestine, India, and China, and on his return in 1853 was appointed to the rectory of St. John's, Hartford. In 1862 he was removed to St. Mark's, Philadelphia, and in 1865 to Calvary Church, New York, where he spent sixteen years in unwearying labour, attracting large numbers by the earnestness and depth of his sermons. He published only one volume, The Social Law of God; but he wrote numbers of essays, reviews, and commentaries, and some of his sermons have been collected and published since his death, as The Great Social Problems of the Day, published in 1884.

Watch-night Service.—That kept in the night between the old and new year.

Wales to the Regency, in opposition to the policy maintained by Pitt. In 1796 he appeared a second time as the defender of revealed religion in his Apology for the Bible, designed as an answer to Paine's Age of Reason. In 1798 he published an address to the people of Great Britain on the danger which threatened their country from the influence of those principles which had occasioned the Revolution in France. GILBERT WAKEFIELD [q.v.] published an answer to this publication, for which he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Watson always continued to be the advocate for liberality, both in politics and in religion; but his fears from the ascendancy of French principles were expressed in a publication under the title of The Substance of a Speech intended to have been spoken in the House of Lords, Nov. 22nd, 1803. The latter part of his life he spent in retirement at Calgarth Park, in Westmoreland. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote others, for the most part political sermons; also Considerations on the Expediency of Revising the Liturgy and Articles of the Church of England, by a Consistent Protestant, and several letters, signed at the time "A Christian Whig." After his death his autobiographical memoir was edited by his son.

Watts, ISAAC, the well-known Puritan divine and hymn-writer, was born at Southampton, July 17th, 1674, died in 1748. He was brought up a rigid Nonconformist, and from his earliest years determined to become a Dissenting minister. He was educated in his native town, and at the age of sixteen was sent to an academy in London kept by Mr. Thomas Rowe, an Independent minister. He remained there for four years, studying so hard as to injure his constitution. He returned home in 1694 for two years, and during this time most of his hymns, and several other works, were composed. In 1696 he became tutor to the son of Sir John Hartopp, of Stoke Newington. In 1698 he was chosen assistant to Dr. Chauncey, minister of the Independent Church in Mark Lane, but continued his duties as tutor till he succeeded Dr. Chauncey in 1702. He became very ill, and an assistant was provided. He remained sick for some time, and in 1712 was attacked by a violent fever, from which he never entirely recovered. He went to visit Sir Thomas Abney, at Theobalds, intending to stay a week; but remained there till his death, in 1748. He officiated in London when he was well enough, but if prevented refused to receive his salary, and devoted himself to literary work. His books were formerly very popular, but have now been superseded. The chief are: Logic, which was at one time used as a text-book at Oxford University; Psalms and Hymns; a number of works for young children, among which are his Divine and Moral Songs; An Essay towards the Encouragement of Charity Schools; Three Dissertations relating to the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity; Horæ Lyricæ; Sermons; etc.

Week.—A period of seven days; also used in the Bible to signify a heptade of anything. The antiquity of the custom of measuring time by seven days is certain; it has even been said that our first parents were commanded to do so in commemoration of the time employed in the creation of the world, and many instances in the early chapters of Genesis testify to its use. It is in use among all the Semitic races, among the Egyptians and Persians, which leaves no doubt of its antiquity; other tribes among which it is found may have adopted it in modern times from the people with whom they have come in contact. Whether the division was made by the Hebrews purely for theological reasons, or whether it was a natural division, hallowed by associations, is open to doubt. The Jews seem to have made no distinction between the six days of the week, the only division being that occasioned by the SABBATH [q.v.], the other days were reckoned merely by ordinal numbers.

Wenceslaus, St., Duke and patron saint of Bohemia, martyr; born in the beginning of the ninth century. He was the son of a Christian prince, Duke Wratislaw, and of his wife, Drahomira, a pagan. He was sent to Prague to be brought up in the Christian religion by his grandmother Ludmilla; when old enough he was sent to a college at Budweis, distant about sixty miles from Prague, and led a grave, modest, and pure life. His father died when he was still young, and his mother became regent, and at once repealed the laws her husband had made in favour of the Christians, and a great persecution and slaughter of the Christians followed. Ludmilla then got Wenceslaus to take the reins of government into his own hands, and helped him with her advice; the nobles, however, decided to divide the kingdom between him and his younger brother, Boleslaus, who had been educated as a pagan, and in whom consequently Drahomira found an ally in her crimes. They plotted against the life of Ludmilla, and she was strangled with her own veil in her chapel. Wenceslaus turned his mind to the reformation of several abuses in his country and governed with great wisdom, but among his subjects there were very many who were averse to any changes, and who mocked at his prayers and religious life, saying that such employments were unfit for a prince and incompatible with the courage and policy necessary to govern a state. His mother and brother were concerting plans to murder him when they learnt that he had begged the Pope to send some Benedictine monks to his kingdom in order that he might spend the rest of his life with them in religious retreat. As, friends remained, the METHODISTS he founded must not be confused, as they so often have been, with that Oxford company of which he was also the leading spirit.

One of his intimate friends at this time was Law, whose Serious Call had been one of the books which had most strongly impressed him. Twice or thrice in the year John and Charles Wesley had visited him, travelling for sixty miles on foot in order to save the more money for the poor. One day Law said to John, "You would have a philosophic religion, but there can be no such thing. Religion is the most plain, simple thing in the world. It is only—we love Him because He first loved us." This remark he never afterwards forgot. Another time Law saw him much depressed, and inquired the reason. "It is because I see so little fruit of my labours," was the answer. "My dear friend," said Law, "you reverse matters from their proper order. You are to follow the Divine light, wherever it leads you, in all your conduct. It is God alone that gives the blessing. I pray you, always mind your own work, and go on with cheerfulness, and God will take care of His."

Wesley's father wished his son to succeed him at Epworth, but he was so wedded to a college life and to the advantages he enjoyed of his retirement and his chosen companions, that he could not be persuaded to consent. His father died in 1735. He had desired John to present to Queen Caroline a book he had just finished, and he went to London for that purpose. There he was strongly solicited by Dr. Burton, one of the trustees for the new colony at Georgia, to go there and preach to the Indians. He refused at first, but afterwards consented; and on Oct. 14th, 1735, he sailed from Gravesend with his brother Charles and two other friends. They arrived at the Savannah in the February following, and preached to the people whom they found on landing, who were the more rejoiced, that means of grace had been scarce with them. Not finding any open door for the prosecution of work among the Indians, the two brothers laboured incessantly where they landed. "The inconveniences and dangers," says one of Wesley's biographers, "which he embraced that he might preach the Gospel and do good of every kind to all that would receive it at his hands: the exposing of himself to every change of season and inclemency of weather in the prosecution of his work, were conditions which few but himself could have submitted to. He frequently slept on the ground as he journeyed through the woods, covered with the nightly dews, and with his clothes and his hair frozen by the morning to the earth. He would wade through swamps and swim through rivers, and then travel till his clothes were dry. His health in the meantime, strange as it may seem, was uninterrupted." His work here was interrupted by a love-passage. He became attached to Miss Causton, the niece of the chief magistrate of Savannah, but eventually declined to marry her, on the advice of his friends. On this disappointment she married a Mr. Williamson, and Wesley refused to admit her to the Communion, upon which her husband indicted him for defamation. The affair was never brought to an issue, but was the occasion of Wesley leaving the colony, which he did on Dec. 3rd, 1737, "shaking the dust off his feet," to use his own expression.

During his voyage back to England Wesley became conscious of a great change in his religious feelings, which may be told in his own words. "It is upwards of two years since I left my native country in order to teach the Georgian Indians the nature of Christianity, but what have I learned myself in the meantime? Why, what I least of all suspected, that I, who went to America to convert others, was never converted myself. . . . All this time that I was at Savannah I was beating the air. Being ignorant of the righteousness of Christ, which by a living faith in Him bringeth salvation to every one that believeth, I sought to establish my own righteousness, and so laboured in the fire all my days."

He arrived in England Feb. 1st, 1738, and found that Whitfield had sailed for America the day before on purpose to assist him. It is characteristic of him that on his journey from Deal to London he preached and read prayers at several places. He was still under concern from a sense of sin and a want of assurance of forgiveness, but he says that the light came to him through the conversation of Peter Böhler, a Moravian, whom he renewed acquaintance with on his arrival. As he attended the afternoon services at St. Paul's he heard the 130th Psalm sung as an anthem, and the same evening he attended a religious meeting in Aldersgate Street, where one was reading Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans. And he says, "I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ alone for salvation, and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine." This event he regarded as his conversion. During his absence the religious movement which began to be known by the name of Methodism had made great progress in London, Bristol, and other parts of the South of England, under the impulse of the enthusiastic preaching of Whitfield. With this enthusiasm Wesley now found himself in full accord, and under its influence he determined, three weeks after his "conversion," to retire for a short time to Germany. He hoped, he said, that the conversing with those holy men [the Moravians] who were themselves living witnesses of the power of faith, and yet able to bear with those who were weak, would be a means, under God, of establishing his soul. Accordingly, in June, 1738, he crossed to Rotterdam, and went on to Herrnhut, the Moravian settlement in Upper Lusatia, when Count Zinzendorf introduced him to the Prince Royal of Prussia, afterwards Frederick the Great. On his return to England in September, he heard that Whitfield had returned from Georgia, and they once more became intimately associated. From this time the history of Wesley becomes merged in that of Methodism, and we refer the reader to the article on that subject. [METHODISTS.] It only remains to note the main dates of the rest of his biography. He began his open-air preaching early in 1739, and the same year gave his sanction to lay-preaching, to the disgust of his High Church brother Samuel. In 1740 he broke with the Moravians, on what he regarded as doctrinal points, and from that time the two parties were in undisguised, and even bitter, hostility. Before the year was ended he had also broken with Whitfield, the result of which was a division of the new religionists into two permanently distinct bodies, though after a while the two men themselves renewed their personal friendship.

From that time his whole life was spent in hard labour for the consolidation of his new Society. He rode 40, 50, even 60 miles a day, reading as he rode, and preaching sometimes five times a day. Towards the end of his life he exchanged horseback for a chaise, and not the severest weather ever hindered him. His journals are filled with graphic accounts of his preachings. We extract his account of his visit to his native Epworth: "Sunday, June 6th, 1742. A little before the services began I went to Mr. Rowley, the curate, and offered to assist him, either by preaching or reading prayers. But he did not choose to accept of my assistance. The church was exceedingly full in the afternoon, a rumour being spread that I was to preach. After sermon, John Taylor stood in the churchyard, and gave notice as the people were coming out—"Mr. Wesley, not being permitted to preach in the church, designs to preach here at six o'clock." Accordingly by six o'clock I came, and found such a congregation as I believe Epworth never saw before. I stood near the east end of the church upon my father's tombstone, and said, 'The Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.' Friday, the 11th, I preached again at Epworth, on Ezekiel's vision of the resurrection of the dry bones. And great indeed was the shaking among them; lamentation and great mourning were heard; God bowing their hearts, so that on every side, as with one accord, they lifted up their voice and wept aloud. Saturday, the 12th, I preached on the righteousness of the Law and the righteousness of Faith. While I was speaking, several dropped down as dead, and among the rest such a cry was heard of sinners groaning for the righteousness of faith as almost drowned my voice. But many of these soon lifted up their heads with joy and broke out into thanksgiving, being assured they now had the desire of their souls, the forgiveness of their sins."

In 1750 Wesley married Mrs. Vizelle, a widow with four children, having not long before written a tract recommending celibacy. The marriage was a most unhappy one. He had stipulated that he was not to preach or to travel less, but his wife became dissatisfied at his continual absences, and was even jealous. He had a high opinion of marital authority, and wrote to her to know him and know herself. "Suspect me no more, asperse me no more, provoke me no more. Do not any longer contend for the mastery; be content to be a private, insignificant person, known and loved by God and me," etc. In consequence she several times left him, and was induced to come back. But at length he besought her no more. "Non eam reliqui, non dimisi, non revocabo" he wrote "I did not desert her, I did not dismiss her, I will not recall her"]. She died ten years later, in 1771.

Wesley himself lived twenty years longer, keeping up his indefatigable labours till the last. The amazing amount of work he got through could only be accomplished by the most rigid economy of time, and resolution in the use of it, under a strain that would have broken most men down; but his health only failed about three years before his death. In spite of this he still rose at four o'clock in the morning, and preached and travelled as usual until the Wednesday before his death, when he preached for the last time at Leatherhead, in Surrey. On Friday symptoms appeared which left little doubt as to the end, and the next four days were mainly occupied by him in praising God. He died about ten o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, March 2nd, 1791, in the 88th year of his age, and after lying in state in his ministerial robes at his chapel in City Road, was interred there on March 9th.

Westminster Abbey.—It is supposed that Sebert, King of the East Saxons, built a Church on the site of the present abbey some time during the seventh century, and this would seem probable, as his grave has always been shown there. In its neighbourhood sprang up a monastery founded by Edgar, the site of which in those days was insular, through the stream which, running down from the Hampstead hills, forked off into a delta, the one branch falling into the river on the site of Millbank Prison, the other near Whitehall. It was known as Thorn Ey, or the Isle of Thorns, and was afterwards called Westminster, to distinguish it from the Cathedral of St. Paul, which was the Eastminster. This structure was destroyed by the Danes in the ninth century. It was rebuilt by Edward the Confessor between the years 1055 and 1065, but of his work little now remains beyond the Pyx-house, which lies to the south of the present abbey, adjoining the chapter-house. It was dedicated to St. Peter, and consecrated on the feast of Christmas, 1065, in the presence of King Edward and many of his nobles; he died five days after, and was buried in the Abbey Church, which he had rebuilt. His tomb is one of the most conspicuous objects in the building. From that time the Abbey became to the English people the most sacred spot in the country, as, groaning under the rule of the Norman conquerors, they looked back to the days of the Confessor as the golden age. On the first anniversary of the consecration, namely on Christmas Day, 1066, William of Normandy was crowned king of the nation which he had conquered. Since him, all the Sovereigns of England have been crowned there. Edward I. brought the famous coronation stone from the Abbey of Scone, and had the coronation chair made which covers it, and on which the Sovereign is still crowned.

Henry III. built most of Westminster Abbey as it now stands; he pulled down the greater part of the Confessor's work, and erected a chapel to the Virgin at the east end in 1220. The Abbey was completed in 1285, in the reign of Edward I. The western parts of the nave and aisle were erected between 1340 and 1483. Henry VII. rebuilt the Lady Chapel of Henry III., and it is called after his name; it stands behind the head of the cross, in the form of which the abbey is constructed. With the exception of the two western towers, the upper parts of which were built by Sir Christopher Wren, Westminster Abbey remains in outward aspect much as Henry VII. left it. Inside, the Abbey is at once imposing and inspiring; it was at one time the burial-place of the English kings, and now it is a mark of national honour to be buried there. The chapel of Edward the Confessor contains his shrine, and the altar-tombs of Edward I., Henry III., Henry V., and Edward III. In Henry VII.'s Chapel, Henry himself, Edward VI., James I., Charles II., William and Mary, Queen Anne, Georges I. and II. were buried, and in the aisles adjoining are buried Mary and Elizabeth, and Mary, Queen of Scots. This is the Chapel of the Order of the Bath. Poets' Corner, which forms the most southern portion of the arm of the cross, contains memorials to the most eminent British poets; here, too, are the graves of Chaucer, Dryden, Dickens, Handel, Sheridan, Campbell, Garrick, Samuel Johnson, Macaulay, etc. In other parts are the tombs of Pitt, Fox, Chatham, Wilberforce, Livingstone. The monuments in the north transept have caused that part to be called "Statesmen's Corner." In the north aisle behind the choir is "Musicians' Corner," with the graves of Purcell, Croft, Blow, Bennett, and others. At the west end of the south aisle is "New Poets' Corner" with monuments to Keble, Wordsworth, Kingsley, Maurice, and others. South of the Abbey are the cloisters, which also contain many graves of interest, and the architecture of which is exquisitely beautiful.

The Abbey, as the name implies, was a monastery ruled by an abbot. The present Deanery, Cloisters, Chapter-house, and other adjacent buildings, form part of what was once this great Benedictine Abbey. The Abbots of Westminster were mitred, and of almost as much dignity as bishops, ranking only second to those of St. Albans. Like Holyrood, this Abbey was enclosed within the precincts of the Royal Palace. Not even the Archbishop could officiate in the Abbey without his leave except at a Coronation. Until 1642 the Regalia were kept here, and though they are now lodged in the Tower, they are placed under the care of the Dean before a Coronation. On the Dissolution of the Monasteries by Henry VIII., a monk of Westminster lived seventy years longer, dying at the age of ninety at the village of Westmeon, Hants, quite blind, reverently tended by a Roman Catholic gentleman there.

Westminster is, like Windsor, a Royal Peculiar; it has a Dean (whose income is £2,000 per annum), an archdeacon, six canons, and six minor canons. For a short time only was it under a bishop. Bishop Thirlby was consecrated in 1540, and remained Bishop of Westminster, which included all Middlesex except Fulham, for ten years, when he was translated to Norwich.

The Memorials of this Abbey, by Dean Stanley, is one of the most delightful works in the language. The daughter of Dean Bradley has also written a very charming handbook.

confined the selection of the candidates for the headmastership to those educated at Westminster fail to be a source of weakness to a declining school. It may, however, fairly be hoped that the separation of the school from the Abbey, and its independent endowment, however much to be regretted for sentimental reasons, will prove of lasting benefit.

Amongst the famous scholars of Westminster we may name William Camden, Ben Jonson, Dryden, George Herbert, Cowper, Southey, Cowley, Gibbon, Froude, Sir Christopher Wren, John Locke, Horne Tooke, Warren Hastings, etc.

Wetstein, JOHN JAMES, was born at Basle in 1693, died at Amsterdam in 1754. His uncle was a famous professor of divinity in that town, and John received most of his early education under him; while Buxtorf taught him Hebrew. In 1713 he was admitted into the Church, and from that time devoted his life to the study of one subject—the genuineness and authenticity of the commonly received text of the Greek Scriptures. He visited most of the countries in Europe in order to examine MSS. in the different libraries. He was in England for this purpose three times; and once, in 1720, was employed by Bentley, who himself published an edition of the Greek Testament. In 1730 Wetstein published Prolegomena to a new edition of the Greek text, which created so much stir and dissatisfaction amongst the clergy of Switzerland that the author was obliged to leave the country. He settled in Amsterdam, where he obtained the post of Professor of Philosophy and History at one of the universities. The Basle Senate offered to allow him to return, but he refused. His edition of the Greek Testament, on which he had spent many years of study and research, appeared two years before his death. It is very rare now, but in spite of some errors is valuable to the student.

Wette, WILHELM MARTIN LEBERECHE DE, one of the most brilliant theologians of modern Germany, was born at Ulla, near Weimar, in 1780, died at Basle in 1849. He was educated at Jena University, and in 1807 became Extraordinary Professor of Philosophy at Heidelberg, and two years later Professor of Theology. In 1810 he was made professor at the new university of Berlin, but was deprived of his post nine years after on account of a letter which he had written to the mother of Karl Ludwig Sand, an Erlangen student who had murdered August von Kotzebue. In this letter De Wette, though he blamed the murderer, said that the crime was due to patriotism, and therefore was not so bad as had been stated. On his ejection from Berlin he went to Weimar, and in 1822 was called to be Professor of Theology at Basle. He became Rector of the University in 1849, but died the same year.

De Wette was the author of Contribution to the Introduction to the New Testament [1805], Contribution to the Introduction to the Old Testament [1806], Commentary on the Psalms [1811], Commentary on the Expiatory Death of Jesus Christ [1814], Compendium of Christian Dogmatics [1813], Christian Ethics [1827], Religion, its Essence and Formal Manifestations [1827], Essence of Christian Faith [1848], etc.

De Wette is one of the leaders of the modern Rationalistic school of Germany. Thus he denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, assigning Genesis to the time of David, Deuteronomy to that of Josiah. He also denied the Messianic character of the Psalms, further than holding that Christianity answered to the ideal future which the prophets set forth. Of miracles he spoke somewhat doubtfully, but settled down to the conviction that, though not historically true, they were symbolic of truth. Of Christianity as a practical system he always spoke with enthusiasm, as well as of the character and person of Christ. In fact, he adopted as his own view the expression of the Apostle, that there is no salvation but in the Name of Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, which he interpreted as the assertion that all nobility of character, all spiritual health, lies in the formation in each man of the Christ-spirit of self-sacrifice.

Whately, RICHARD, Archbishop of Dublin [b. 1787, d. 1863].—One of the leaders of popular religious thought in this century. His father was a Prebendary of Bristol, and Richard was the youngest of a large family. He was entered at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1805, and became a Fellow in 1811. There, in union with Davison, the author of Discourses on Prophecy, and Copleston, then Provost of Oriel, afterwards Bishop of Llandaff, he founded what is known as the "Early Oriel School." To this school belonged Arnold, who came as a youthful scholar of Corpus in 1815; Hampden, afterwards Bishop of Hereford; and for a short time J. H. Newman. Keble was a Fellow of Oriel at the time, but always stood aloof from this society. To these names is to be added that of Dr. Hawkins, who succeeded Copleston as Provost in 1828, and held the post until 1882—a man of powerful influence in his time, who, surviving his fellows, still maintained their liberal principles even when the potent influence of Newman was at its height. The most popular writer of the school was Whately. The best of his writings was probably his Historic Doubts Respecting Napoleon Bonaparte [1819], a clever pamphlet in which he reduces to absurdity the dictum of Hume of the incredibility of miracles in spite of any evidence.

works, and a translation of Josephus, the only one which lasted any long period.

Whitaker, WILLIAM [b. 1548, d. 1595], Regius Professor of Divinity at Trinity College, Cambridge [1579]; Chancellor of St. Paul's [1580], and master of St. John's [1586]. He wrote many works on behalf of Protestantism and Calvinism; as—A Disputation on Holy Scripture against the Papists, especially Bellarmine and Stapleton [1588], and An Answer to the Ten Reasons of Edward Campian the Jesuit [1581], both of which were written in Latin, but have been translated into English.

Whitby, DANIEL, D.D. [b. at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 1638; d. at Salisbury, 1726].—An English divine. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, 1653; took his M.A. degree, 1660; was elected a Fellow of the College, 1664; made chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury, and afterwards Precentor of the Cathedral in 1672; and in the same year he was presented to the Rectory of St. Edmund's, Salisbury. He published from time to time a series of attacks on Romanism: The Absurdity and Idolatry of Host Worship, Romish Doctrines not from the Beginning, etc.; and also appeared as a defender of the Dissenters in his Protestant Reconciler himself humbly pleading for condescension to Dissenting brethren in things indifferent. The book was attacked on all sides, and condemned by the University of Oxford to be publicly burnt; and Whitby was obliged to recant his opinions, with an apology for the heresy. He also published a second part of the Protestant Reconciler, with an appeal to the Dissenters to rejoin the Established Church. The next turn which he took was a publication of an Arminian work: A Discourse on the Five Points of Calvinism. His Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, published in two folio volumes in 1703, was long regarded as a valuable work. In D'Oyly and Mant's Bible it is largely drawn upon. But it is now looked on as of little worth, either as regards scholarship or devotional feeling. He is continually protesting, in a sort of nervous and excited manner, against Arianism, and in 1714 he adopted Arian views, and published Dissertatio de S. Scripturarum Interpretatione, which involved him in a controversy with the Trinitarians. To the end of his life he continued to uphold Arianism, and to write repeated attacks on Popery. He is said to have been a very lovable man in personal life.

Whitby, SYNOD OF.—By the middle of the seventh century the Irish Church, through the exertions of its workers, had become so powerful that the clergy of England deferred to the judgments of its bishop rather than to those of the Pope. Oswy's Queen, Eanfleda, daughter of Edwin and Ethelburga, brought with her from Kent the Roman way of calculating Easter, while her husband's household adhered to the custom of St. Columba. This led to disputes between those of the clergy who had been ordained by the Scots, and the disciples of Augustine and Paulinus; and a few years before the arrival of Theodore, a famous council was held on this question at the Abbey of Whitby in 664. Agilbert, a French prelate, who was now Bishop of Dorchester, was the leader of one party; and Colman, Bishop of Lindisfarne, was speaker of the other. Agilbert, however, retired to Franco, and deputed Wilfrid, a young Northumbrian priest, who had passed some years in study at Rome and Lyons, to plead for the rule of Italy and France. Oswy, who presided at this council, after listening in turn to Colman and Wilfrid, one of whom traced his practice to St. John, the other to St. Peter, on hearing the text, "Thou art Peter, and I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," stopped the debate. "Is it true, Colman," he said, "that our Lord spoke these words to Peter?"—"Most true."—"But can you prove that any such power was given to your Saint Columba?"—"We cannot."—"Then," said the King, "I dare not withstand this door-keeper of heaven, but must obey his rule, lest, when I come to that door and ask for entrance, he should refuse to turn the key." The assembly of earls and commoners decided that it would be expedient to leave the erroneous calculation and adopt the better. It is most likely that the influence of the Queen had previously persuaded Oswy to take the part he did. It was unfortunate in its result, as it gave offence to Colman, a plain sincere Christian, who shortly after resigned his bishopric, and retired, with the greater part of his Scottish monks and clergy, to a monastery in Ireland.

White Brethren.—Christian hermits who arose in Italy among the Alps in the fourteenth century. They were called "White Brethren," "Albati," or "Bianchi," from their garments of white linen, which reached to their feet, and covered all their faces except their eyes. They were headed by a priest, whose name and nationality are unknown, who, with a crucifix in his hand, led them down into the Italian plains in 1399. He called himself the prophet Elias, and called on the people to follow him to a crusade to regain the Holy Land from the Turks. Not only the peasants, but priests and cardinals enrolled themselves under his banner, till his followers are said to have numbered forty thousand. They marched from city to city, singing hymns, and daily increasing, till Pope Boniface feared they would attack the Papedom, and sent out a band of troops, which met the pilgrims at Viterbo, seized the leader, and dispersed the others. The priest was put to death as a heretic at Rome about the year 1403.

Whitfield, or Whitefield, GEORGE, one of the most celebrated of English preachers, was born at Gloucester, 1714, died in America 1770. His father was a wine merchant, and his mother kept an inn at Bristol. At the age of fifteen he had made some progress in classical studies, and while assisting his mother in her business he wrote many sermons, showing the serious impressions he already had. When eighteen years old, he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, and fraternised with the body of young men who were termed "Methodists" [q.v.]. At the very early age of twenty-one, Dr. Benson, Bishop of Gloucester, "reckoned it his duty," as he said, to ordain George Whitfield. The following Sunday he preached in the church where he was baptised, to a very large congregation, on the benefits of religious society. A complaint being made to the Bishop that fifteen people went mad after hearing that sermon, it was said that he replied "that he wished the madness might not be forgotten by next Sunday." He took a curacy in London for two months, working indefatigably amongst soldiers and prisoners; then, after returning to Oxford for a while, he undertook work at Dummer, in Hampshire, where he catechised the children daily, read prayers twice a day, and formed the habit of dividing his day into three parts: eight hours for study and retirement, eight for meals and sleep, eight for reading prayers, catechising, and visiting. At length he decided to join the Wesleys in America, and went to bid farewell to his friends in Gloucester, and it was on this journey that he first met with the marvellous success in preaching which was a feature in his work ever after. Large congregations flocked to hear him at Gloucester, Bath, Bristol, and Stonehouse. As his popularity increased, much opposition arose from the clergy, who strongly protested against his written opinion that "his brethren should entertain their auditories oftener on the new birth." He reached Savannah, May 7th, 1738, and preached three or four times every Sunday. He soon saw the great need of an orphan house, which he eventually built, returning several times to England to raise the necessary funds. He was ordained priest in England in 1738. Finding on Sunday, Jan. 21st, 1739, that the churches were not large enough to contain all the people who flocked to hear him, it occurred to him that open-air preaching would be an advantage; so on going to Bristol in February he carried out his idea, preaching at Kingswood to nearly 2,000 people, many of them being colliers with whom few dared to mingle. Beginning with about one hundred of these colliers at the first special service held in the open air for them, the congregation steadily increased until nearly twenty thousand eagerly listened to him at one time. He often said that the sight of such a multitude so anxiously listening to his words made him almost powerless to speak anything, but that God Himself seemed to supply the words. He went about for some time preaching to numbers of rich and poor in Wales, Gloucestershire, and Worcestershire, and on April 26th, 1739, preached for the first time in Moorfields and on Kennington Common to immense crowds. On returning to America that summer he went through Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina. In speaking of his journeyings through America, he says: "It is now the seventy-sixth day since I arrived at Rhode Island. . . . I have been enabled to preach, I think, 175 times in public. . . . I have travelled 800 miles, and gotten upwards of £700 sterling for the Georgia Orphan Homes." He again left America for England in 1741, and, on going to preach as of old at Kennington, was amazed and saddened to find that very few would listen to him owing to his having written against Archbishop Tillotson and others who differed from him. Scarcely one hundred people listened to him at Kennington, and few of his old supporters came even to see him. He was anxious to raise money for the Homes, yet saw no opening to get the much-needed sum of £1,500. At Bristol, he was prevented from preaching in the very house he had founded there. But one or two other ministers there soon joined him in starting a school at Kingswood to promulgate Calvinistic doctrine. Open-air preaching was begun again, and large audiences gathered round him, and at Moorfields, on account of the bad weather a large shed was erected, which was called a tabernacle. He visited Essex and Suffolk also, and had immense audiences wherever meetings were held. Ten thousand heard him at one time at Braintree. In 1741 he accepted urgent invitations to visit Scotland, where he was warmly received by the Erskines. He preached at Dunfermline first, then in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Paisley, Perth, Stirling, besides smaller towns. He there gathered £500 for the Orphan Home in America, and proceeded through Wales to London. At Abergavenny he married a widow, Mrs. Jenner. Next he dared to preach at Moorfields when a fair was being held, and he writes that no fewer than one thousand letters were received by him from persons under conviction of sin, and three hundred people joined his community at once. In 1743 he again visited Scotland, and what took place in the West at Cambuslang is described thus by him: "People sat till two in the morning hearing sermons, disregarding the weather. You could scarce walk a yard but you must tread upon some either rejoicing in God for mercies received, or crying out for more. Thousands and thousands have I seen, before it was possible to catch it by sympathy, melted down under the word and power of God." At the celebration of the Holy Communion their joy was so great that they arranged for a second. The Communion table was in the field; three tents were all surrounded with a multitude of hearers; above twenty ministers attending to preach and assist. About this time he received sad news of the Spaniards landing in Georgia, but he encouraged his friends by his unbounded trust in God's care for them and the Orphan Home, which faith was soon rewarded by all danger from the Spaniards being removed. In 1744, just before starting for America, he was nearly murdered in his bed by one of four men who had designs upon his life, but so little moved by resentment was he that he refused to prosecute these men, and as crowds gathered round him at Plymouth to see one who had been so nearly killed, he expressed his joy that greater opportunity was given him to draw them to seek their happiness in Christ. His health became affected, and after four years in America he was advised to visit the Bermudas, where he met with a hearty welcome from the English colonists. After three months there he returned to England, where at first he met with great discouragement, but eventually an opening to preach to the great people as well as the poor was afforded him by Lady Huntingdon, who had welcomed him to her house on his arrival. The Earl of Chesterfield and Lord Bolingbroke were amongst the brilliant audiences who so eagerly listened to him twice a week. In 1748 he paid a third visit to Scotland, meeting with every encouragement and success, and between that year and 1751, when he laboured in Ireland for a time, he travelled through almost every town in England. He returned to America after a time, but his constant travels undermined his health, and at length he succumbed to a fit of asthma at Newbury Port, in New England, on Sept. 30th, 1770. He was not quite fifty, and had spent thirty-four years in the ministry.

Whitgift, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury; famous for his zeal and energy in spreading the doctrines of the Reformation. He was born at Great Grimsby in 1530, where his father possessed a large merchant business; died at Lambeth in 1604, and was buried in Croydon parish church. His uncle, Robert Whitgift, though Abbot of a monastery, had long predicted the speedy downfall of the Church of Rome, and as John's early education was entrusted entirely to him, he naturally was influenced from the first in favour of the Reformation. In 1555 he went to Peterhouse, Cambridge, the college being at that time under the superintendence of Bishop Ridley. John Brudford, the martyr, was his tutor. He also made the acquaintance of Grindal. Cambridge leant decidedly to the Reformation, and Whitgift had by this time become quite convinced of the truth of its doctrine. He was ordained in 1560. On the accession of Queen Mary he had to hide for some time, as his life, with that of many of his colleagues, was in the greatest danger. From the accession of Elizabeth he worked hard in the Protestant cause. All through his life he was remarkable for his firmness in carrying out what he judged to be right, without reference to the opinions of those about him. He has been accused of harshness and severity, but it must be remembered that his were perilous and anxious times, when half-hearted measures were of no use. He lived for the most part at Cambridge, where he had been appointed Regius Professor of Divinity, but his fame as a preacher reached the Queen, who in 1565 made him one of her chaplains and Master of Trinity College. As soon as he had the power he set to work to reorganise the government of the college, with which he had long been dissatisfied; and, as a ground-work, he insisted strongly on conformity to the Established Church. In 1571 he was asked by Archbishop Parker to write an answer to a book lately published by the Puritan Cartwright, entitled an Admonition to Parliament, which violently attacked the teaching and discipline of the Reformed Church. This he did very successfully, and as a reward was made Dean of Lincoln by the Queen in 1573, and Bishop of Worcester in 1576. He resisted the teaching of the Roman Catholics on the one hand, and of the Puritans on the other; in this way a great contrast to the meek and timid Archbishop Grindal. The latter was considered a dangerous man to have at the head of the Church at such a critical time, so the Queen and the Privy Council commanded him to resign, and offered the Primacy to Whitgift. He refused to take the office while Grindal was alive, but accepted it on his death in 1583. His first act was to insist that all the clergy should be obliged to subscribe to three points—that the Queen was the Supreme Head of the Church; that the Common Prayer and Ordination Services contained nothing contrary to the teaching of the Bible; that the Thirty-nine Articles agreed in all particulars with the Holy Scriptures. His one idea all through his life was to obtain absolute uniformity of religion in England. With this in view he obtained an order from the Star Chamber to restrain the liberty of the press. Only matter was to be printed which had been licensed by the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London, or their chaplains. It was in consequence of this that the famous MARTIN MARPRELATE CONTROVERSY [q.v.] took place. His private character was estimable, and he was much respected by learned men, as may be seen from the dedication to him both of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity and Stow's Annals. He was exceedingly liberal, built and endowed a hospital and a school at Croydon, both flourishing at the present time, and restored the hospital of Eastbridge. He was afraid, at the accession of James I., that much of what he had been able to effect would come to naught from the King's supposed indifference to the Church of England; and he took the earliest opportunity of begging James's favour to the Church. He attended the Hampton Court Conference, but did not live to see the plans laid there carried out.

Whithern, or Candida Casa, BISHOPRIC OR.—This was the See of a border district which was evangelised by St. Ninian in the beginning of the fifth century. Alongside of the kingdom of Northumbria, which extended from the Humber to the Forth, there was also a kingdom of Cumbria or Strathclyde, a district inhabited by the southern Picts, and extending from the Mersey to the Clyde. The Venerable Bede says of St. Ninian, a native of North Wales who converted the southern Picts, and became their first bishop, "This holy man . . . Yeowell 118 . . . Roman arms." He was "indisputably," according to Stubbs and Haddan, the founder of this See, "and within a few years subsequent to A.D. 400." But nothing is known of the diocese, or of St. Ninian's successors, until the Saxon conquest brought hither a Saxon bishop nearly three hundred years afterwards. Before the Saxon Conquest the old British diocese appears to have been absorbed into that of Glasgow, but in A.D. 685 Egfrith formed the southern portion of that great diocese into a new district under the old name, just as Hexham had been recently formed out of the northern part of the great diocese of York. There were six bishops of Candida Casa in about a century, the last dying in A.D. 791; but when Galloway was reunited to Scotland, Whithern ceased to be an English diocese, and became part of the Scottish diocese of Galloway. Cumberland and Lancashire eventually became part of York diocese, until the foundation of the See of Carlisle in 1132.

Whitsunday.—The common English name for the Feast of Pentecost, celebrating the gift of the Spirit and the foundation of the Christian Church on earth. The derivation of the word has been the subject of much dispute. Three solutions have been offered, but there is a certain amount of doubt about each of them. The most common is that the word was originally spelt "White Sunday," and was so called because in the early Church the catechumens were baptised on that day, and that their white garments gave name to the festival. But when it is noticed that the Prayer Book speaks of Whitsun Week, Whitsun Monday, and not Whit Monday, this derivation hardly holds good. Others derive it from the German Pfingsten—"Pentecost," and say that though some of the links in the chain are missing, the word through various changes has come to Whitsunday. The other solution is suggested by an old poem, probably written about the fourteenth century, in which the writer evidently takes for granted that Whit is a corruption of Wis or Wisdom—

"This day Whitsunday is cald,
Was gowen to the Apostles on the day."

Whitsun-farthings, called also smoke farthings, the offerings formerly made by every one at Whitsuntide who lived in a house with a chimney, to the cathedral of the diocese in which he lived.

Wicelius or Witsel, GEORGE [b. 1501, d. 1573], was educated and ordained in the Roman Church, but adopted the Reformed religion, for which he was driven from his charge in 1525. He was appointed pastor of Niemeck, but relapsed into Romanism, and was expelled in 1530. He helped to draw up the Augsburg Interim. He lived at Fulda from 1540-54, and then, on the spread of the Reformation, withdrew to Mayence, where he died. He wrote Typus ecclesie prius, and Querela pacis.

Wichern, JOHANN HEINRICH, Christian philosopher, was born at Hamburg in 1808, died there in 1881. He studied theology at the Universities of Gottingen and Berlin, and soon after started the institution in his native town which has made his name famous. Dr. Schaff says that he is the representative of practical philanthropic Christianity in Germany—a title which he deserves, as will be seen when some account of his efforts has been given. His first work was to institute a Free Sunday-school in the town, which in a short time numbered over 600 scholars. But his greatest achievement was the foundation of what he called his Rauhes Haus. Here he received boys who had been left quite destitute, kept and cared for them; had them taught some useful trade, and then sent them to make their way in the world. It is, in fact, managed very much on the same plan as Dr. Barnardo's Homes in England. He was also one of the leaders of the movement still doing much work in Germany under the name of the Innere Mission, the object of which is to fight against the heathenism and irreligion still prevalent amongst the lower classes of the large towns. Wichern was offered many posts of honour, but refused them all, and gan to make his presence felt there, ng frequently on subjects in which the was more or less directly interested, s the religious education of the young, mission of Jews into Parliament, the r legalising marriage with a deceased sister, and the revival of the active s of Convocation, which had been long nt at the time of his consecration to the ate. In 1848 some bitter controversy cited by the part he took in reference nomination of Dr. HAMPDEN [q.v.] Bishopric of Hereford, and it must be sed that the Bishop in this matter did pear to advantage. When Lord John l nominated Hampden, Bishop Wilber- oined the opponents. But suddenly he over to the other side, and printed a i which he preached in favour of den, and a letter in which he implied e latter had made concessions to him. den immediately published another g this in a curt manner, and Bishop tts of Exeter wrote his brother of l a letter of vehement sarcasm and ve, which Wilberforce's candid bio- r, Canon Ashwell, has printed. In 1869 he accepted e of Winchester on the resignation of mner, having before that time changed ws on the subject of clerical resigna- and become the most active promoter, the actual author, of the Act passed to aged incumbents to resign their livings, tire on a pension when incapacitated ther work.

He was, however, before all things, -working bishop. He was a thoroughly plished preacher, and it was one of his teristics that he took as great pains chieved as great success with the st village congregation as with the istinguished audience in London. He acted as the spiritual chief of his dio- nd did his utmost to awaken religious every corner of it; he was not content ctg as a mere overseer; he was its power, and his clergy learnt to look n for constant encouragement and t.

In the Church at large he held a very distinct and valuable position; his early life imbued him with the religious views of the Evangelical school, and his veneration for his father would alone have been sufficient to maintain their influence in his mind through- out life. But as a man who thoroughly shared in the thoughts and feelings of Ox- ford, he was not likely to hold aloof from that remarkable development of thought which marked the first fifteen years of his ministry. He was in consequence regarded as belonging to the High Church school, though he always held back from the extremes of that party; but he saw that its followers were at least reviving the organisation of the Church, and he turned their principles to great account in practical administration. It says much for his modera- tion that, coming to his diocese just when the Tractarian storm was at its height, he guided it through the crisis without a breach with any party among his clergy. Party feeling ran high for a time, but the Bishop's mani- fest earnestness, and the twofold sympathies which he embodied, formed a bond of union amid the discord, and he probably rendered the Church a great service by guiding and harmonising the confused movements of the day.

In Convocation he spoke with energy and fervour on all subjects connected with the Church. He was a very popular man; what- ever he undertook he did with grace, ease, and heartiness. As a platform orator he has rarely been equalled; in the best sense of the term he was a "many-sided" man, and into his active career, many careers, so to speak, were crowded together. He was indefatigable in work, and in the management of two very important dioceses he showed great adminis- trative ability and energy of personal character. His was an eloquence which never failed; it shone equally in his pastoral charges, in his confirmation addresses, and in those spirit- stirring appeals which he would deliver in Cuddesdon Chapel to the candidates for Holy Orders. He excelled also as a parliamentary orator. As an author he has left us no deep theological work, but his name will be re- membered for a History of the Episcopal Church in America, and by two or three charming religious allegories, the most popu- lar of which are Agathos and The Rocky Island. His sermons are some of them models of eloquence, and the personal in- fluence which he exerted upon those who were brought into contact with him shows him to have been a good as well as an able man.

Wilberforce, WILLIAM [b. 1759, d. 1833], one of the noblest philanthropists in the his- tory of the world, was born at Hull. He went first to the Hull Grammar School, and on his father's death in 1768 lived with an uncle at Wimbledon, who sent him to school near appointed to the See of York. As the primacy was vacant, Wilfrid went to France to be consecrated by Agilbert, Bishop of Paris, and did not return till about five years later, when he found St. Chad in possession of his See. The latter, however, vacated it in his favour, and Wilfrid set to work to restore the minster, which had fallen into disrepair; and he built also a minster at Hexham and one at Ripon, at the dedication of which he made a feast to King Egfrid and all the chief persons in the kingdom, which was a striking contrast to the simplicity of the former bishop, St. Chad. For some time the King and the bishops were on friendly terms; but the zeal of Wilfrid to enrich the Church, to the detriment of Egfrid's revenue, and the magnificence of his retinue and monasteries, excited the King's anger, and Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, was summoned to hear the accusations against him. He proposed that the diocese should be divided into the Sees of York, Lindisfarne, Hexham, and Whithern, but as Wilfrid would not consent to this Theodore declared him deposed, and he started for Rome to appeal to Pope Agatho, returning victorious with a letter to the King. Egfrid declared that he had bribed the Pope, and imprisoned him for nine months, first in Northumberland, then at Dunbar; being released, he went to Sussex, the most barbarous kingdom in England, which was not yet converted to Christianity, and which was suffering under a severe famine. Wilfrid first gained the friendship of the people by teaching them to fish, so that they were all the more ready to hear him when he began to preach to them. He founded a bishopric at Selsey, which was afterwards removed to Chichester. He went up the Meon Valley, in Hampshire, between the two kingdoms of Sussex and Wessex, which was inhabited by a colony of Jutes, and here he founded the church of Warnford, as an ancient inscription on the wall still testifies. The ancient church of Corhampton in the same valley was also probably built by him. About 690 Egfrid died, and Wilfrid was recalled to York; but his uncompromising manner gave offence, and he was again declared deposed. He was restored, however, after King Aldfrid's death, and died in 709 at the monastery of Oundle, which he had founded in Mercia.

Wilkins, JOHN, Bishop of Chester [b. at Fawsley, Northamptonshire, in 1614; d. in 1672]. His father was a citizen of Oxford, but he was born at the house of his mother's father, John Dods, a noted Dissenter, and here he spent his earlier years. At the age of thirteen he entered as a student at New Inn Hall, Oxford, and afterwards Magdalen Hall. He took his B.A. in 1631, and his M.A. in 1634, and was then ordained and became successively Chaplain to Lord Say, Lord Berkeley, and Charles, Count Palatine of the Rhine, who resided in England for some time studying mathematics with Wilkins. His Puritanical principles led him in the Civil War to join with the Parliament and to uphold the Solemn League and Covenant. In 1648 the Committee for the Reformation of the University of Oxford made him Warden of Wadham College. In 1656 he married a sister of Cromwell. Richard Cromwell made him Master of Trinity College; but he was ejected at the Restoration, and, coming to London, became Preacher at Gray's Inn, and soon after Rector of St. Lawrence Jewry. In 1663 he was chosen one of the council of the Royal Society, which was then incorporated; and, through the influence of another member, Seth Ward, Bishop of Exeter, he was introduced to Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, and was soon promoted to the deanery of Ripon, and on the death of Bishop Hall, in 1668, became Bishop of Chester. Wilkins is said to have been a man of inconstant mind and unsettled principles, ready to swear allegiance to the ruling power; but he was benevolent, and according to his biographer, Anthony Wood, "a person endowed with rare gifts, a noted theologian and preacher, a curious critic, an excellent mathematician and experimentalist, and one as well seen in mechanisms and new philosophy as any of his time." He is the author of many scientific works. Among his theological publications are: Ecclesiastes, or a Discourse on the Gift of Preaching [1646]; Discourse concerning the Beauty of Providence, in all the Rugged Passages of it [1649]; Discourse concerning the Gift of Prayer [1651], and after his death Tillotson published an unfinished treatise of his Of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion [1675], and a volume of Sermons [1682]. He died at the house of Dr. Tillotson in Chancery Lane, and is buried in St. Lawrence Jewry.

Will.—That faculty of the soul by which it chooses or refuses anything which is offered to it. It is therefore distinct from the understanding. "I see and approve the better things," said the heathen moralist, "and I follow the worse." Herein he confessed that his will was not in accord with his intellectual faculties. Nor is the Will synonymous with the desires and appetites. These may be spontaneous and either good or bad, but other motives acting on the Will may lead it to resist them. That the Will is free is implied in the very term, "for if a man acts in any given manner because he is forced, it is no longer an action of the Will." The Will indeed is finite, because man himself is a finite being, but within the extent of its capacity it is and must be able to choose. The great question about Free Will, regarded theologically, is stated in the article on FREE WILL. We may put it broadly thus: according to the Roman Catholic view, man lost control of his Will by sin, and recovers

Williams, John, Archbishop of York, was born at Aberconway in Carmarthenshire, in 1582, died in 1650. He went to St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1598, was ordained, and became a proctor of the university. He then removed to London, and was chaplain to Lord Chancellor Egerton, upon whose death, in 1619, he was made Dean of Salisbury, whence he was in 1620 preferred to the Deanery of Westminster. In the following year he became Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and in 1626 was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln. He soon afterwards rendered himself unpopular at court because he refused to comply with all the wishes of Buckingham, which occasioned him to lose the Great Seal, and he was ordered not to appear at the coronation of Charles I. He also angered Archbishop Laud by his opinions concerning the position of the Communion table. The dispute broke into a formal controversy, and occasioned Laud's Cool from the Altar, answered by Williams. Soon after a Bill was brought before the Star Chamber accusing him of revealing the King's secrets; he was heavily fined, and in 1636 imprisoned in the Tower. He remained there for four years, but was released by the Long Parliament in 1640. The King was reconciled to him, cancelled the records of his trial, and raised him to the Archbishopric of York, allowing him to hold the Deanery of Westminster for three years in commendam. He only survived the King's death a year, dying at Glodden on his sixty-eighth birthday.

Williams, John, a famous Nonconformist minister [b. 1796, d. 1839] sent by the London Missionary Society to preach to the South Sea Islanders. He was born at Tottenham, and having been a short time at school was apprenticed to an ironmonger in the City Road. When he had served his time, he determined at once to fit himself as far as he could for the work of a missionary. With his wife and three other ministers he left England in November, 1816, and just a year later landed on one of the Society Islands. They succeeded in converting many of the natives to Christianity, and as a rule were treated with great kindness even by those who refused to listen to their preaching. He came to England once for a few weeks, and also paid a visit to Sydney, for the purpose of consulting a doctor about his health, which was very bad at the time, and which he was afraid would force him to give up his work. With these two exceptions he worked among the people of these islands till 1839, when he was cruelly murdered by the natives of Erromanga the first day he landed on their shores.

U.S., who deserves mention as the first to publicly promulgate the doctrine of entire liberty of conscience and worship, without any qualification whatever, and to act upon it consistently through his own life in the midst of many provocations. He was born at Conwyl Cayo in Wales, in 1599, was befriended and educated by Sir Edward Coke, and ordained to the ministry of the Church of England; but soon adopting Puritan views, was compelled to emigrate to America, and arrived at Boston in 1630. At this early age of thirty, as Bancroft says, "his mind had already matured a doctrine which secures him an immortality of fame. . . . In the capacious recesses of his mind he had revolved the nature of intolerance, and he, and he alone, had arrived at the great principle which is its sole effectual remedy. He announced his discovery under the simple proposition of the sanctity of conscience. The civil magistrate should restrain crime, but never control opinion; should punish guilt, but never violate the freedom of the soul. The doctrine contained within itself an entire reform of theological jurisprudence. It would blot from the statute-book the crime of nonconformity, would quench the fires that persecution had so long kept burning, would repeal every law compelling attendance on public worship; would abolish tithes and all forced contributions to the maintenance of religion; would give an equal protection to every form of religious faith."

When Williams arrived in Boston, therefore, he could not unite heartily with Churches which, in spite of their own bitter experience of persecution, violated every one of these principles nearly as much as that Church from which they had fled, and he found himself involved in hot and bitter controversy for what, to him, were the first rights of the human soul. The magistrates compelled every man to attend worship; Williams reprobated that law. They compelled men to maintain that worship, and demanded of Williams if the labourer was not worthy of his hire? "Yes," he replied, "from them that do hire him and from no other." Magistrates themselves were to be chosen from church-members; he said this was as proper as to select a doctor or pilot for his skill in theology. And so on every point. Such views could not but give deep offence, and in 1635 he was summoned to Boston to stand examination on his grand principle that "the civil power has no jurisdiction over the conscience," and was actually threatened by the one-time fugitives with transportation back to England. To avoid this he fled to the territory of Narraganset, where he purchased land for himself and a few companions, calling the new settlement Providence, and engaging specially in mission-work among the Indians, with whom he acquired greater influence than any other man of the time.

cathedral at Utrecht. He built there two churches, one of which he dedicated to our Saviour and the other to St. Mary, choosing the latter for the cathedral. When he had worked for some years in that part of Friesland which belonged to France, he turned his attention to West Friesland, governed at that time by a man named Radbod, who, in spite of all persuasions and entreaties, remained a heathen: he, however, allowed the Archbishop to preach in all parts of his kingdom, and severely punished any who ventured to interfere with him or any of his band. He then went to an island called Walcheren, belonging to Zealand, and caused several churches to be built there. In the year 731 he was joined by BONIFACE [q.v.], who stayed with him three years, and then went into Germany. Willibrord died in 739 or 740, in extreme old age. He lived to see the nation which he had found in a state of barbarism one of the most cultured in Europe at that time. He was buried at Epternac, in the monastery he had built and endowed there.

Willihad.—When news came of the martyrdom of BONIFACE [q.v.], many wished to go at once to try to convert those who had opposed and killed him. The head of the little band was Willihad, a native of Northumbria, who, in spite of great difficulties and fierce opposition, preached in all parts of the country. At one place the chief wished to put him to death for daring to despise the national idols, and it was agreed that lots should be cast whether he was to die or be set free. The lot was in Willihad's favour, and he reached a place called Drenthe safely. After several years Charles the Great suggested to him that he should turn his attention to the people of Wymodia, who up to that time had not had the chance of giving up their heathen religion for a better, no missionary having visited them. At first the people seemed to listen to him gladly; but in 782 a man named Wittekind incited the people to rebel, and Willihad had secretly to make his escape. He determined before entering on any new work to go on a pilgrimage to Rome, and to seek an interview with the Pope. He went for two years to the monastery of Epternac, and there, in 787, the news came to him that Wittekind wished to be baptised, and that the country was quiet and ready to listen to him again. Charles the Great thought this a favourable opportunity to make Wymodia a diocese, and persuaded Willihad to be consecrated Bishop of Eastern Friesland. He constantly journeyed through his diocese, baptising and preaching, and was everywhere well received. He chose the town of Bremen as the site of his cathedral church, and watched its progress with great interest. He did not live to see it finished, for in the year 789, when holding a Visitation, he was seized with a fever at a place called

Wilson, THOMAS, Bishop of Sodor and Man, one of the holiest of English prelates, was born at Burton, in Cheshire, 1663, died in 1765. After he had graduated at Dublin, he was appointed chaplain to the Earl of Derby, who, as Lord of the Isle of Man, made him Bishop of that diocese in 1797 at the early age of thirty-four. He found the inhabitants of the island far behindhand both as regards civilisation and religious life. Being a man of great energy and possessing wonderful powers of organisation, he set to work in good earnest, and in a very short space of time had improved their condition in both matters. In 1707 he drew up a sort of Catechism for the people, which was the first book ever printed in Manx. Its English title was Principles and Duties of Christianity, later changed to The Knowledge and Practice of Christianity made easy to the Meanest Capacities. It was not only published in English, but also translated into French and Italian. He took the keenest interest in all missionary efforts, and at different times of his life presided over various societies. He was Bishop nearly fifty-eight years, and he left his diocese under wise and strict rules for the maintenance of good Church discipline. His life was so active that he wrote comparatively few books. What he did write, however, are regarded as some of the greatest treasures in the way of devotional books in the English language—notably Parochialia, Sacra Privata, and Short and Plain Instructions for the Better Understanding of the Lord's Supper. He gave instructions for the Bible to be translated into Manx, but did not live to see it completed. It appeared in 1772. His life was written in 1781 by the Rev. C. Cruttwell. Several editions have since been published, the most important being that by Keble, as part of the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, (1847-52).

Winchester, BISHOPRIC OF.—In the year 633, Birinus, a Benedictine monk of Rome, offered himself to Pope Honorius to penetrate into the innermost parts of Pagan Britain, "to sow the seeds of the holy faith." He was consecrated by Asterius, Bishop of Genoa, and, landing on the West Saxon coast, took up his abode there, and preached diligently before King Kynegils and his people. His efforts were aided by King Oswald, who had come to seek the hand of the daughter of Kynegils, and the latter was baptised in 635; the place of baptism is not stated, but it may be assumed that it was Winchester. The ancient city of Caer-Gwent had been laid in ruins by Cerdic, but had risen again, and was now the chief residence of the Court, its name passing into Went-Coaster. It is said that on the occasion of his baptism, Kynegils gave land to the clergy for seven miles round Winchester School.—The College of St. Mary of Winchester was founded by WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM [q.v.], Bishop of Winchester. He made the special wants of the age his study. He saw how the religious instruction of the people had fallen off in consequence of the decreasing number of the clergy, and he determined to remedy this evil by helping poor scholars in their clerical education, and establishing two colleges of students for the increase of God's worship, for the propagating of the Christian faith, and for the improvement of the liberal arts and sciences. He had planned this soon after coming to the See, and had already bought the land in Oxford. In Winchester he agreed with one Richard Horton that for ten years he should diligently instruct in grammatical learning so many poor scholars as he should send him, and the Bishop agreed to provide him with a good assistant. His plan was already complete in his own mind: it was to provide for the perpetual maintenance and instruction of 200 scholars, to afford them a liberal support, and to lead them through a perfect course of education—from the first elements of knowledge through the whole circle of the sciences. Two establishments, one subordinate to the other, were to compass all this. He resolved to build the College at Oxford first, and began to deal with it as with Winchester; he would not wait till his buildings were finished, but gathered his students, found a governor for them, provided their lodgings, and laid down their code of management. The King's patent giving him leave to build is dated June 30th, 1379. He published his charter of foundation the November following, in which it is called Seinte Marie College of Wyncestre in Ozenford. But it was popularly called "New College," and that name still remains. The building was finished in six years, and was opened with much solemnity, April 14th, 1386. In the charter of St. Mary's, Winton, bearing date Oct. 20th, 1382, Thomas Cranley is nominated as the first warden. The first stone was laid March 26th, 1387, and it was opened March 28th, 1393. It had at once its full complement of scholars, and continued all along to furnish members to New College. At first it was ruled by a master and undermaster, then it was committed to a warden. The first nomination of fellows was made by the founder in 1394.

The situation of the college is singularly good, standing as it does on the south side of the city, without the walls, between two branches of the Itchen, which flow through the cathedral precincts. The open meadows on the south stretch down to St. Cross and Twyford. There is no useless ornamentation in the buildings: indeed, it is a characteristic of Wykeham's work everywhere that all his decoration was made to serve some useful purpose. In the present case it was needful to make his foundation safe from attacks. The east was secured by the brook; on the north he drew a wall of 300 feet; to the west was the back of the stables and another long wall which turned at the south to the brook again. The northern wall, facing the king's highway (which had the conventual grounds of St. Swithun's Priory on the opposite side), had one entrance only, a gateway, which led into a large fore-court. Round this were the brewhouse and bakehouse, malt and flour-rooms, slaughter-house, stables; for the ancient monastic economy provided for all articles of use and consumption within its own walls. Opposite the first gateway was another, which led into a quadrangle, 120 feet by 110 feet, around which the college buildings were grouped; between these buildings and the river were gardens. The outer walls are bare of ornament, because they were for defence; but the school buildings form a beautiful and dignified feature in the view, especially from the Giles Hill side. At the south-east portion of the quadrangle is the chapel, adjoining which is the muniment tower; west of this was the school, and refectory above it, and again west of this, forming the south-west corner, the cellar, the buttery, the bursary,

Its evil use is condemned in Prov. xx. 1; xxiii. 31, Isa. v. 22, etc. Another word is tsreek, from a root signifying "to possess," and so called, says Gesenius, "because it gets possession of the brain and inebriates." This is the word used in Gen. xlvii. 28, 37, Deut. vii. 13., etc.

In the New Testament the commonest word is oinos, a word closely connected with the English equivalent "wine." This is the word used in John ii. 9, and that it was fermented and intoxicating is shown by reference to Mark ii. 22; Eph. v. 18, where the same word is used. Another word, gleukos, "sweet wine," is also used in Acts ii. 13 of intoxicating drink. The argument which is sometimes brought forward that the wine used at the Last Supper was unfermented, because the Jews at that season rejected all things leavened, fails from the fact that the Jews have never been in the habit of putting away wine, though at the Passover season they are most rigid in abstaining from the taste or touch of any drink into which grain has entered, and to use only the fermented juice of the grape, prepared by their own hands.

On these grounds it is very strongly contended by strict rubricians that the use of what is called "Unfermented Wine" in the Holy Communion is altogether inadmissible as being contrary to the use of the whole Church from the beginning, and that such matter is not in the scriptural sense wine at all. It is further contended, not unreasonably, that the innovation is but a renewal of the old Encratite heresy. But there is no reason to be urged against those abstainers, who regarding abstinence in common life as in the highest sense expedient, desire also to keep the Holy Communion as far as may be free from that which may intoxicate, and therefore use a wine which, though fermented, and therefore genuine wine, contains but little alcoholic strength.

Winer, GEORGE BENEDIKT, one of the many great German writers on Biblical criticism in this century, was born at Leipzig in 1789, died there, 1858. Having passed through the course of education at Leipzig with great honours, he was appointed Professor of Theology in 1839, and kept the post till his death. He wrote an almost endless number of books, nearly all treating of the Bible, or of subjects connected with it. His great desire was to give a new direction to Biblical criticism, being convinced that writers were too fond of theories, and did not give enough attention to facts. His critical abilities were great and his judgment was sound. Of his many works there are three which deserve special mention: a Bible Dictionary; a Grammar of New Testament Greek regarded as a sure basis for New Testament Exegesis; and a Grammar of the Chaldean Language as con- tained in the Bible and the Targums. The two latter have been translated into English.

Wiseman, NICHOLAS, Cardinal and Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster [b. of an Irish family at Seville, 1802, d. in London, 1865], was educated at Waterford, and at St. Cuthbert's College near Durham, and in 1818 entered the English College at Rome. In 1823 he received Holy Orders, was made Vice-Rector of the English College and Professor of Oriental Languages at the Roman university, and was made a D.D. His first writings were published in 1828, the earliest being Hore Syriacæ, from MSS. in the Vatican; and in 1836 the Doctrines of the Catholic Church appeared, which had already been delivered as lectures, and which was the first step towards his reputation in England. In 1840 he was appointed Coadjutor Vicar-Apostolic of the Central District of England, with the title of Bishop of Melipotamus in partibus Infidelium, and President of St. Mary's College, Oscott. In 1849 he became Vicar-Apostolic of the London district, and in September of the following year, at the new distribution of the kingdom into twelve Sees, he was nominated Archbishop of Westminster and a Cardinal Priest. The appointment was regarded in England with strong suspicion and dislike, as it was looked upon by Church of England members as a blow aimed at the Establishment; Cardinal Wiseman partly allayed the panic by an Appeal to the People of England concerning the Catholic Hierarchy, and by other lectures and essays, which gained the admiration of friends and foes alike. He was a genial man, popular in society. He wrote various works on the doctrine of the Eucharist and other matters of Roman dogma, and some books on science and art, The Influence of Words on Thought and Civilization, etc., which have gained a wide circulation.

Wishart, GEORGE, called "The Martyr."—One of the early Scottish Reformers; supposed to have been a native of Forfarshire, though the circumstances of his birth are unknown; he first came under notice as headmaster of a grammar school at Montrose at the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was here that he began to teach the Reformation doctrines, which so roused the anger of the guardians of his pupils that he was obliged to flee for a time to England, where he was seized on a charge of heresy, and publicly recanted at Bristol in 1538. In 1543 he returned to Scotland with the Commissioners who had been employed to treat with Henry VIII. for the marriage of Prince Edward with the infant Queen of Scots. Wishart now openly adopted the profession of Reformer, and travelled about through Scotland stirring up the mob to rebellion, and causing riots and destruction wherever he preached, while he defied all attempts of the authorities to stop the actively engaged in the Civil War; and it was while taking part as an officer in the Parliamentary Army that he was made prisoner after the battle of Edge Hill, and, as his property had been seized before by the Royalists, he and his family were in a pitiable state. Up to the time of the Civil War Wither belonged to the Established Church; then he might be said to have relinquished the forms rather than its ordinances. He called himself a "Catholic Christian," and said "he separated himself from no Church adhering to the foundations of Christianity." His political friends were amongst the most noted of those days, and, besides Milton and Dryden, included Michael Drayton, Thomas Cranley, Hayman, and Christopher Brooke. He was engaged in writing a Paraphrase on the Ten Commandments almost up to the last hour of his life. He was buried in the church belonging to the Savoy Hospital.

Wodrow, ROBERT.—An ecclesiastical historian [b. at Glasgow, 1679; d. at Eastwood, Renfrewshire, 1734]. He entered the Glasgow University in 1691, and was appointed Librarian of the College at an early age; in 1703 he received his licence to preach, and in the same year became minister of Eastwood, near Paisley, where he remained till his death. The intermediate time was spent by him in untiring literary work, and he was also a zealous Church politician, attending all ecclesiastical courts when it was possible, and fulfilling his duty as one of a Committee of Presbyters formed for the protection of the Church of Scotland after the Union of 1707. He was a strict adherent to Presbyterianism, and opposed the Act for re-establishing Patronage; he was appointed, with four others, to go to London to urge its repeal, but, failing in this object, he quietly submitted, and recommended his colleagues to do the same. The work to which he devoted his life was a History of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to the Revolution, on which he expended the greatest care, and the first edition of which was published in 1721. It is a most valuable work as regards the accuracy of its facts, even to the smallest details; but it is one-sided, badly arranged, and absolutely deficient in all grace of style. Wodrow also wrote The Lives of the Scottish Reformers and Analecta: a History of Remarkable Providences.

Wolf, JOHANN CHRISTIAN [born at Breslau in 1679, died at Halle, 1754].—A German metaphysician. He was Professor of Physical Science at the University at Halle, and first came into notice through the opposition of the Pietists, who were shocked at his method of applying the test of mathematics to religion as well as philosophy. His colleagues, Francke and Lange, charged him with being a despiser of religion and a teacher of error, and the Faculty of Halle lodged a formal complaint against him with the king. The chief ground of this accusation was his oration, De Philosophia Sinensium Morali, in which he approved the morality of Confucius, and it was said also that he encouraged social anarchy. In November, 1723, a Cabinet decree was issued ordering him on pain of death to leave the Prussian dominions within forty-eight hours, and Prussian subjects were forbidden under heavy penalties to read his books. Wolf fled to Cassel, and within a year accepted a Chair at Marburg, whence his fame spread rapidly. He adopted the principles of Leibnitz, and endeavoured to popularise them by reducing them to a systematic method by means of mathematics. His system of philosophy grew at length to be considered an indispensable part of intellectual culture, and many German writers adopted his method. In 1740, when Frederic II. came to the throne, he was recalled to Halle, where his return was celebrated with a complete ovation, and he was made rector of the university, a Privy Councillor, and baron of the Empire.

Wolf was a voluminous writer, both in Latin and German; he published some German school-books of philosophy, and a number of treatises on special subjects in physics and mathematics, and he did much to create the widespread taste for philosophical speculation which has of late years characterised Germany. He also gave to rationalistic theology its fundamental principle; and Kant, while criticising him sharply, confessed that he was a great dogmatic philosopher. Wolf's disciples have cultivated most zealously his views on natural theology.

Wolfe, REV. CHARLES, Christian poet, born at Dublin, 1791, died at Cork, 1823. He was educated chiefly at Winchester, and in 1809 entered Dublin University, took his degree in 1814, and was ordained in 1817. His literary fame rests principally on The Burial of Sir John Moore, but he wrote other poems, which together with fifteen sermons were published after his death by the Rev. John Russell, under the title of Remains of the late Charles Wolfe, A.B., Curate of Donoughmore, Diocese of Armagh. Some of his poetry was of real merit, but is now well-nigh forgotten.

Wolff, JOSEPH, a missionary, was born near Bamberg in Germany in 1795, died in 1862. He was of Jewish origin, and his father was a Rabbi; but through the influence of some friends he was converted to Christianity, and was baptised into the Roman Catholic Church by a monk in 1812. Three years later he paid a visit to Rome, but there began to be dissatisfied with the teaching and ritual, and was therefore expelled from the city as a heretic by the Inquisition. He came to England and joined the Established Church, and, having studied Oriental languages at Cambridge, was employed as a missionary to the Society for the Conversion of the Jews in the East. He travelled for nearly twenty years in all parts of the world, finishing with America, where he was ordained deacon. He returned to England and was ordained priest. Being tired of a wandering life, he took a curacy in Yorkshire; but in 1843 the rumour coming that two British officers were in the greatest danger in Bokhara, Wolff started off to find them. After many adventures and hair-breadth escapes, he ascertained that they had been murdered there, and then settled down as Vicar of Isle Brewers, in Somersetshire, where he died. Wolff was a most amusing man, original and quaint to eccentricity. Thus he would jump up in the middle of a dinner-party and volunteer a Bokhara song. And it was a favourite boast of his on his visits that he needed no carpet bag, having all his toilet requisites about him. But he was a man of deep piety and of remarkable kindness of heart, as well as of learning and shrewdness. He wrote accounts of his various missionary journeys—Missionary Journal and Memoir, Narrative of a Mission to Bokhara in the Years 1843-5, Travels and Adventures of "J. W.", etc., etc.

Wolsey, THOMAS, Cardinal, ecclesiastic and statesman, was born at Ipswich in 1471, died at Leicester in 1530. He was educated at Ipswich School, whence he went to Magdalen College, Oxford. He took his B.A. at fifteen years of age, and was therefore called the "Boy Bachelor." He became Fellow of his College, and was appointed tutor of a school in connection with it. His first preferment was to the rectory of Lymington, in Somersetshire [1500]. He was soon after named as Deputy to Sir John Nafant, Treasurer of Calais, who introduced him to King Henry VII., in whose favour he soon gained a prominent place. He was made Royal Chaplain [1505], and Rector of Redgrave [1506], and was in 1507 chosen to go to Flanders as Ambassador to the Emperor Maximilian. Wolsey transacted the embassy so quickly and well that he was rewarded by the Deanery of Lincoln [1508]. In the following year the King died, and was succeeded by Henry VIII. Up to this time Wolsey, though a rising man, had no great public influence; but now preferments were heaped upon him. He was made King's Almoner in 1509, and rose so rapidly in the King's favour that he soon did anything he pleased. He became Rector of Torrington, Canon of Windsor, and Registrar of the Order of the Garter, Prebendary and Dean of York, Dean of Hereford, Precentor of St. Paul's, Bishop of Tournay, Bishop of Lincoln, and in 1514 Archbishop of York. In the following year he was made Cardinal, and succeeded Warham as Chancellor, and in 1516 Legatus-a-Latere, which gave him great wealth as well as power over the English clergy. He also farmed the revenues of the Bath, Worcester, and Hereford dioceses for the foreign bishops who held them, and held in commendam the abbey of St. Albans. He lived in the greatest splendour at York Palace (now Whitehall) and at Hampton Court, which he built for himself. His household consisted of more than 500 persons, among whom were nine or ten lords, fifteen knights, and forty squires. These promotions not being enough to satisfy his ambition, he aimed at the Papedom, which he hoped to get, as Charles V. was his client, and a great part of the Cardinals were his pensioners. On the election of Adrian VI. he attributed his disappointment to Charles, and this determined him to procure the divorce of Queen Catherine, if he was not the first to suggest it. This the King consented to, but instead of agreeing to marry the Duchess of Alençon, as Wolsey wished, he resolved on Anne Boleyn. This was sufficient to displease the Minister, but, further, the clergy were almost unanimously against the divorce; so were the English merchants, whose prosperity depended so much upon the Flemish markets, which were under the control of the Emperor. Wolsey therefore shrank from the storm, while Henry was determined, and this led to a breach between King and Minister. The Pope, Clement VII., in hesitation between King and Emperor, bade Henry act on his own responsibility, but the latter demanded that the Papal Bull allowing his marriage with Catherine should first be declared null. Then the Pope appointed Cardinals Wolsey and Campeggio to be a commission to try the case. They met at Blackfriars, but soon adjourned in perplexity. The Pope cited the parties to appear before him at Rome. Henry was furious, and banished Wolsey from Court, and in 1529 he was charged with having transgressed the Statute of Præmunire by holding a Legatine Court within the realm. Wolsey admitted the charge, and all his preferments were taken from him; but in 1530 the Archbishopric of York and the Bishopric of Winchester, which he had recently acquired, were restored to him. He did not, however, enjoy them long, for his rivals at court, jealous of hearing of his popularity in the north, revived the King's wrath against him, and he was arrested at his Yorkshire residence of Cawood on a charge of high treason, and brought towards London to take his trial but died on the way, in the monastery of Leicester.

"Wolsey," writes J. R. Green, "had done more than any of those who went before him to raise the New Monarchy into an overwhelming despotism. All sense of loyalty to England, to its freedom, to its institutions, had utterly passed away. The one duty which had filled his mind was a duty to his prince."

a prince whose personal will and appetite was overriding the highest interests of the State, trampling under foot the wisest counsels, and crushing with the blind ingratitude of a Fate the servants who opposed him. But even Wolsey, while he recoiled from the monstrous fame which he had created, could hardly have dreamed of the work of destruction which the royal courage, and yet more royal appetite, of his master was to accomplish in the years to come." [Hist. of Eng. People, p. 324.] It should be mentioned that Wolsey was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of Cardinal's College, Oxford, now Christ Church.

Woman.—The change effected by Christianity in the position of woman has been of a most marked character. Under the Roman law, women were under the perpetual tutelage of their male relatives, the object being to keep their property in the family. They had no voice in public affairs, nor, legally, in the government of their own household. A child desiring to marry need not obtain the mother's consent—only that of the father. On her marriage her property became that of her husband, and all her earnings were his. In the Oriental world her position was still more debased; she was a slave, not a co-partner with her husband. Mr. George Smith, in his Assyrian Discoveries, tells how a man could pay half a mina to his wife, and say to her, "Thou art not my wife," which freed him from her thenceforth; though, if a woman repudiated her husband, she could be drowned.

It was with the Oriental condition that the Old Testament found its points of contact. It was emphatically proclaimed in the first book of the Scriptures that monogamy was the original intention of the Creator, and though polygamy was practised, it was discouraged; while, as our Lord said, divorce was only permitted "for the hardness of men's hearts." It was one of the darkest features of the growth of Hebrew civilisation that royal polygamy became frequent in the days of David and Solomon, and was the chief cause of the troubles of each of those reigns. As the Old Testament moves onwards, the sacredness of marriage is more and more dwelt upon.

The times of the New Testament brought religion into contact with European civilisation. Roman law had undergone a change. There had arisen another form beside the ancient one, called "Free Marriage," recognised by law, and of which the children were held to be legitimate, but not always held to be a respectable connection. It was a form established in the interest of the woman, for she was allowed to keep her own property, worship her own gods, and keep up intercourse with her paternal family. Such a wife was called uxor and matrona, a name less honourable than the materfamilias of the old law. The "Free Marriage" had almost superseded the older form in the first Christian century, and under it there was the utmost freedom of divorce, and morality had sunk to a terrible depth. Juvenal tells of a woman who had had eight husbands in five years. When Christianity became the national religion, Constantine, although himself further from the Christian standard of morals than some of the Pagan Emperors, proceeded at once to legislation with a view of diminishing the moral evils of the time. By laws passed in 330-331, a wife could be divorced from her husband only under three conditions—viz., when he was a murderer, or a magician, or a violator of tombs. A wife repudiating her husband was banished with loss of her property. A husband could be divorced on proof of his wife's unfaithfulness, but was prohibited from having a concubine. The mischief, however, had eaten too deeply into the public life for the then-existing type of Christianity to be able to end it; and to this fact is to be attributed the piecemeal and ineffective legislation of succeeding emperors. "It need not be said," writes Mr. Brace [Gesta Christi, p. 29], "that the Christian system of morals demanded the utmost purity of life, as well from the man as from the woman. In regard to masculine purity, it is still in advance of the current opinion of the civilised world. So strongly is this elevation of morals characteristic of Christ's life, that we do not look for or expect direct teachings against vice. No direct denunciation is transmitted from Him against one of the most terrible organised evils of ancient or modern times—prostitution—or against the unnatural vices which were eating out the heart of Roman and Greek society. The impression, however, which an impartial reader would get from the narrative is of a person so pure and elevated that such vices could not even be thought of when under His influence. His power goes to the back of organised vices, and touches the sources of character. His relations to abandoned women; the story of the adulteress which, whether true or imagined, shows the popular conception of His character; and the few words reported from Him on these and related topics, together with the character of His early followers, all point to the unique elevation and nature of His influence on the great weakness and sin of mankind. He required absolute purity from man as from woman. He was not, however, alone in this. The stoical moralists had done the like; yet but few of their followers had ever practised this high self-restraint, and no great example stimulated them to it. Even the stoical jurists alluded to the principle, but there is little question that, before Christianity entered the world, comparatively few persons felt this obligation of morals. Had the Founder of Christianity simply taught purity as some of the early Fathers taught it—as meaning absolute ceaster, a stronghold of the Hwiccas. Its first bishop, Bosel, was consecrated in 680. St. Dunstan was Bishop from 957 to 961. Oswald, who succeeded him, was a great friend of the monks in opposition to the secular clergy; he built a church to St. Mary to the north-east of the present cathedral, containing twenty-seven altars for his monks. No traces remain either of the church or monastery; they were ruined by Hardicanute's soldiers, and Bishop Wulfstan began the existing cathedral in 1084; in 1089 the eastern part was ready for consecration. He built also the crypt, which is one of the glories of Worcester, and in 1092 held a synod in it. Within a quarter of a century the roof was destroyed by fire, and in 1202 it was again greatly injured by fire. Many miracles were said to be wrought at the tomb of Wulfstan; it was visited by King John in 1207, and that King, by his own special request, was buried beside St. Wulfstan in 1216. In 1218 the cathedral was reconsecrated with much pomp by Bishop Sylvester, in honour of St. Mary, St. Peter, St. Oswald, and St. Wulfstan, in the presence of the young King Henry III. The choir, retro-choir, and Lady Chapel were commenced in 1224 by Bishop Blois, and are in the Early English style. Bishop Giffard, in 1269, added the gilt rings round the columns, probably to hide the iron clamps which welded the stonework together. In the fourteenth century Bishop Cobham [1317-1327] revaulted the north isle of the nave, and in 1377 Bishop Wakefield vaulted the nave itself; he also, in 1380, built the present north porch. The central tower had fallen in 1175, and was rebuilt about 1281. In 1502 Prince Arthur, the eldest son of Henry VII., was buried here, and an exquisite little chapel marks the spot. The cathedral suffered much in the Rebellion from Essex's and Cromwell's troopers. During the Commonwealth no services were allowed; they were resumed April 13th, 1661.

Traces of Norman work are to be found now in the walls of the transepts, in the western part of the choir, the eastern arch of the north transept, and elsewhere. The piers of the tower encase a Norman "core." Outside there are two Norman doorways surmounted by Norman windows, and a central doorway, which was decapitated by a great west window in 1380. The chapter-house is Transitional Norman; its upper walls were rebuilt in the fifteenth century. The cloisters are in the Decorated style; near their entrance is a small door, famous archaeologically as the "Miserrimus" door: at the foot of the steps leading to it is a stone with the single word Miserrimus, "most wretched one," engraved on it as an epitaph. Many have been the imaginations of hopeless lover or half-despairing penitent lying below—one of which is enshrined in a well-known sonnet of Wordsworth; but local history has dispelled these more romantic associations, and revealed in him the Rev. T. Morris, vicar of Upton-on-Severn, an old loyal Jacobite, who died in 1748, aged eighty-eight, sorrowing to the last for the fallen dynasty.

One of Worcester's most celebrated bishops was HUGH LATIMER [q.v.].

A complete restoration was commenced in 1857 by Mr. A. G. Perkins, the cathedral architect, and continued on his death by Sir Gilbert Scott, who superintended the whole of the interior work. It was reopened after restoration in April, 1874.

The chapter includes a dean, two archdeacons, four canons, four minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The income of the See is £5,000 a year. The diocese comprises the whole counties of Warwick and Worcester, part of Stafford, and portions of adjacent counties, and includes 482 benefices.

Wordsworth, CHRISTOPHER, D. D., youngest brother of the poet, was born in 1774, at Cockermouth; died 1846. He was educated at Hawkshead and at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow in 1798. He was made Chaplain to Dr. Manners Sutton, Archbishop of Canterbury, and became successively Rector of Ashby and Oby-with-Thirne [1804]; Dean of Bocking, in Essex [1808]; Rector of St. Mary's, Lambeth, and of Sundridge, in Kent [1816]; Master of Trinity College, Cambridge [1820], in which year he also exchanged his livings of Lambeth and Sundridge for the Rectory of Buxted-with-Uckfield, in Sussex. He was the author of a work in six volumes, Ecclesiastical Biography; or, the Lives of Eminent Men connected with the History of Religion in England.

Wordsworth, CHRISTOPHER, Bishop of Lincoln, the son of the preceding, was born in 1807, died in 1885. He was educated at Winchester, and went thence to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he won the Chancellor's English medals in 1827 and 1828, the Porson prize, the Brown's medals, the Craven scholarship, and was Senior Classic Medallist in 1829. Soon after taking his degree he gained a Fellowship, took orders, and in 1836 became Public Orator at Cambridge. He succeeded Longley as Head Master of Harrow in 1836, which post he held eight years, being nominated by Sir R. Peel to a canonry at Westminster in 1844. He acquired great fame as a preacher, and in 1847 and 1848 delivered the Hulsean Lectures at Cambridge. In 1865 he became Archdeacon of Westminster, and in 1869 was nominated Bishop of Lincoln in succession to Bishop Jackson, translated to the See of London. He resigned only a few weeks before his death, living just long enough to carry his project of the Southwell bishopric. [q.v.]

Bishop Wordsworth was an eminent classical scholar. He visited Greece several times, and embodied his observations in two very charming works, Athens and Attica, and Greece, Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical. Even in the last years of his life he showed that in the midst of his untiring labours he had not forgotten his old tastes, for he published a very excellent edition of Theocritus. But it is as a theologian that he will be remembered. His Commentary on the Bible is one of the most remarkable works of this century, whatever opinion may be formed of the soundness of the Bishop's views, which may be summed up at once in the expression "High Anglican." It amazes the reader to open one of the volumes at hazard and see how the notes bristle with references to the Fathers and to the great English Divines, and there seems no limit to the Bishop's acquaintance with them. He was the most uncompromising of men against Rationalism and Freethought, the strenuous assertor of verbal inspiration. And he was equally fierce against Romanism, maintaining that the Babylon of the Apocalypse is the Roman Catholic Church. He was one of the writers against Essays and Reviews, in the volume edited by Bishop Wilberforce, being pitted against Professor Jowett on the subject of inspiration. When Dr. Stanley was appointed to the Deanery of Westminster, Dr. Wordsworth, as one of the canons, protested on the ground of Stanley's opinions. However, the friendship which grew up between them was warm and sincere. Another work of the Bishop's which must not be forgotten is his Theophilus Anglicanus, a manual in catechetical form, of Church doctrine and government from the Bishop's Anglican standpoint. It has been widely circulated, and is the most complete work of its kind. But no account of Bishop Wordsworth could be just which left out of sight his untiring energy as a bishop, his geniality and hospitality, his self-sacrifice and munificence. It was said of him as Canon of Westminster, that poor curates were as frequent and as heartily welcomed at his table as rich men, and to him and Lord Hatherley it was mainly owing, that a great number of churches were built and endowed in Westminster. Judged by his writings, Bishop Wordsworth might be thought one of the narrowest of theologians, but his life proved him to be one of the most generous and large-hearted men that have ever graced the English Episcopate. Several volumes of his Sermons in Westminster Abbey were published chiefly on current topics, and he was the author of some of our best known hymns.

Wordsworth, WILLIAM, poet, was born at Cockermouth, in Cumberland, 1770: died 1850. His early education was at a public school at Hawkshead in Lancashire, where he remained till 1787, when he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and continued a student there till 1791. In the preceding autumn he had made a pedestrian tour in France, and on leaving college he returned to that country, being strongly imbued with Republican principles. He however returned to England in 1792, shortly before the execution of Louis XVI. He spent his time in a desultory manner, having taken an aversion to entering the ministry, to which profession he had been destined. He took to writing poetry, and in 1793 published two poems, An Evening Walk, addressed to a Young Lady, and Descriptive Sketches, taken during a pedestrian tour among the Alps. These, however, did not meet with much notice, and as Wordsworth had no private means, he contemplated writing political articles for the newspapers but just then a legacy of £900 came to him, and on this sum he and his sister lived for seven years, when a further sum of money came in which enabled him to devote himself to poetical composition. In 1797 Wordsworth made the acquaintance of Coleridge, who resulted in the intimate friendship of the two poets. In 1798 they jointly published Lyrical Ballads, which was coldly received; they travelled together in Germany, and then Wordsworth took up his residence at Grasmere, whence in 1808 he removed to Allan Bank, both in the Lake Country. Up to 1814 he gave to the public only his minor poems, and for these had to bear severe criticism and ridicule. His style was to the world eccentric, and his language bald even to puerility. But while he only published these short and desultory effusions, his mind was developing his great philosophical poem The Excursion; this he published in 1814, and though not a commercial success, nor at once securing the admiration it merited, yet it found readers able to recognise its worth, and eventually was confessed to be one of the greatest poems in our language. In 1815 came the historical poem The White Doe of Rylstone; in 1822 a volume called Memorials of a Tour on the Continent, and some years later a noble series of Ecclesiastical Sonnets; in 1835 Yarrow Revisited, and other Poems. In 1803 he had published his Platonic Ode on Immortality, neglected then, but afterwards given a high place among his compositions. A few years after his death, one of his grandest works, The Prelude, was published, a long autobiographical poem in blank verse. In 1839 he received the honorary degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford; in 1842 a pension of £300 per annum was granted to him by Government; and on the death of Southey, in 1843, he became Poet Laureate.

Wordsworth's poetry has exercised a vast influence on the literature and religious thought of England. His firm determination to revolutionise our poetry by casting away the artificialism into which it had sunk, to be the poet and describer of nature and not the repeater of what people said about nature, exposed him, as we have said, to satire and ridicule. "This will never do," was the beginning of Jeffrey's celebrated attack in the Edinburgh Review. But Wordsworth had no doubt of the truth of his views, or of the high responsibilities of the poet, and he kept on his course unmoved until he had brought about the revolution in public opinion which he had sought after, and is confessed by nearly all critics to be the greatest poet of the nineteenth century, indeed the greatest since Milton.

His poetry is open to objection in the eyes of two classes of religious thinkers. The late Archbishop of Dublin, a very enthusiastic admirer of Wordsworth, objects to him that he did not take sufficient count of the sorrows and sins of the world. Living in retirement among the still lakes and mountains, apart from the struggles and agonies of men, he seems to have so given himself to the love and admiration of natural beauty, as to suppose that perfectibility was within man's reach by the culture of nature, and not to have realised the terrible mischief which sin has wrought in the world. His own life was wonderfully pure and blameless, but he was not brought into contact with the rough hardships and temptations which are the lot of thousands. "Whatever," says Mr. Stopford Brooke, "may have been his stated creed, he laid aside as poet the severer doctrine of original sin." The other objection which has been made to Wordsworth is his ecclesiasticism. He was always enthusiastically attached to the Church of England, and while much of his verse transcends all distinctions of party, and even stands in the outer circle of natural religion, outside Christianity itself, the greater part of it contemplates Christianity in its concrete form as a system of Faith, Discipline, and Doctrine, such as it presented itself to him in the Ordinances of the Church of England. The beautiful White Doe of Rylstone is throughout accented by the poet's admiration for the Church as it came forth from the hands of the Reformers in the days of Elizabeth. The muse of Keble was nursed upon Wordsworth, who in his turn was greatly influenced by the Church movement of 1833.

Work of Christ.—This is stated in the Angel's words to St. Joseph, when he said of the Holy Child who should be born, "Thou shalt call His Name Jesus: for He shall save His people from their sins." The Work of Christ is to save from sin.

Although this is the view most frequently put before us in Holy Scripture, it should not be forgotten that there is much and unquestionable support for a belief of the Franciscan divines of the Middle Ages that the first object of the Incarnation was the uniting of God and man in one in holiness; that God the Son would have become incarnate even if man had never sinned, since humanity would not have attained its perfection if Christ had not come into the world. And certainly the promises of glory and honour to man from union with Christ so far exceed his restoration from his fallen state, that we should always bear this view in mind.

In considering, however, the Work of Christ, His Office of Saviour necessarily comes first, and the statement of the manner in which He accomplished our salvation is known as the doctrine of the Atonement. [ATONEMENT.] Christ worked our salvation both by His Life and by His Death.

[1] By His Life. [a] His perfect obedience. Man—the first Adam—fell by disobedience to God; the second Adam came, as He repeatedly said, not to do His own Will, but the will of His Father, and as St. Paul says, "For as through the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, even so through the obedience of the One shall the many be

This statement may be illustrated by a few extracts:—

[1] Anglican Church.—"One Christ, very God, and very Man . . . truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile His Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men" [Article II.] "Almighty God . . . Who didst give Thine only Son Jesus Christ to suffer death upon the Cross for our redemption; who made there (by His one oblation of Himself once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world." [Prayer of Consecration in the Office of Holy Communion.]

[2] Roman Catholic Church.—"We must believe that Jesus Christ, our Saviour . . . offered Himself a Sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, by dying upon a cross to purchase mercy, grace, and salvation for us; and that neither mercy, nor grace, nor salvation can, or ever could since Adam's fall, be obtained any otherwise than through the death and passion of the Son of God."

"By this one offering we were completely redeemed, inasmuch as our ransom was paid . . . Neither can there now be any need of His dying any more, or purchasing any other graces for us than those for which He has already paid the price of His blood." [Dr. Challoner's Garden of the Soul.]

[3] Congregationalists.—"Christ is described as a propitiation, showing the righteousness as well as the love of God, in the pretermission and pardon of sin, and revealing Him as at once the Just and the Justifier—maintaining law and yet justifying transgressors who believe in Jesus. He dies "for us," and "by His stripes we are healed." He pays the penalty we had incurred, and ransoms us from everlasting destruction. He takes our place; He expiates our offences; He bears the burden of our sins, and endures their penal consequences. From His cross we catch the inspiration of self-sacrifice." [Dr. Stoughton's Doctrine of the Atonement.]

Some follow Abelard in denying that a satisfaction or ransom for sin was necessary, or that we are to regard Christ's death in that light. Archdeacon Farrar says: "What Christ came to reveal was the love of God to man, seeking man's salvation. Of a need of compensation on God's part neither He nor His Apostles breathed a word . . . Is it not enough to say that Christ's death is the means of our life; that it is a reconciling sacrifice; that it is but one act of that sacrifice which marked the submission of His whole will to that of His Father; that it has redeemed us from the power of sin and Satan; that it was the appointed means of our regeneration, of our new life, of our ransom from the bondage of Satan, of our satisfaction for the debt of sin, of our being reconciled to God, of our hope of glory? If we believe all this . . . we may rest in the words . . . of the English Prayer Book [Art. xxxi.]; and need enter no further into the transcendent and incognisable aspect of the Atonement."

The Rev. John Page Hopps, the Unitarian preacher, considers that "not the reconciliation of God to man, but of man to God," is needed. That "in a very profound sense it might be said that the Atonement is all that Christ is to any one—not only all that He was but all that He is." He takes the words of St. Paul, "in Christ," as going to the very heart of the subject; and says that the new moral and spiritual creation which comes of being "in Christ" is of God, as the result of the reconciling work of Christ.

There is a value in all reverent attempts to explain the Atonement, since they all help to throw light upon it; the mistake is to select one view as containing the whole truth.

It will be seen from what has been said thus far, that the different views about the work of Christ in the Atonement fall into two classes:—[a] The view of those who consider that God does not need to be reconciled to man, but man to God; and that the phrases and words which would imply the necessity for any "propitiation," "ransom," "redemption," etc., etc., are altogether metaphorical, and only variously describe the effect of the Atonement in its relation to us, that they are a condescension to our limited power of understanding the mysteries of God, and that we had better keep to the Scriptural term "reconciliation," and not use the ambiguous word "Atonement," which has been discarded in the Revised Version. [b] The view of those who consider that although man needs to be reconciled to God, God must also be reconciled to man, and that the words implying ransom, sacrifice, etc., do describe, in human terms it is true, actual verities. These terms are chiefly four:—

[1] a sin offering, an atoning sacrifice, implied in Heb. i. 3; John i. 29; xix. 36; Rev. v. 7; [2] a reconciliation, Rom. v. 11; 2 Cor. v. 19, 20; Gal. iii. 19, etc.; [3] a ransom from slavery, 1 Tim. ii. 6; [4] Satisfaction or the discharge of a debt, involved in Gal. v. 3; 2 Cor. v. 21; 1 Pet. iii. 18. We use the three last of these expressions in speaking of sin or indebtedness between man and man, and, because language possesses no better terms, the sacred writers use or imply them in describing our sin against God. Obviously they are all inadequate, since we do not understand the mystery of evil, or even of the least sin, much less the light in which they appear to God. But we cannot doubt that the terms are true as far as they go, and within the limits which the analogy of the faith places upon them.

The first phrase, that of sin offering, or atoning sacrifice, is altogether a religious one. Mankind has felt from the earliest ages the need of some sacrifice or offering either to God draw near to the throne of God, we who are not worthy so much as to gather up the crumbs under His table, we who only deserve to be outcasts from His presence for ever; if we are permitted to have the sacred privilege of speaking to Him, of drawing near to Him through the atoning blood, of calling Him Father, of being treated by Him as sons, of being admitted into the blessings of sacred intercourse, of feeding at His table, and of being ever loved by Him with an everlasting love, are we to come back just as if nothing had happened? Are we to be as cold as before? Is there to be no joy in the heart, no glow on the countenance, and no evidence either to ourselves or others that we have had the sacred privilege of being with Jesus? Surely such worship must kindle emotion."

The notices which we have of Christian worship in the New Testament are fragmentary. Brethren used to assemble together, especially on the first day of the week. The fullest passage bearing on the subject is in 1 Cor. xiv., a careful exegesis of which throws much light on Apostolic practice. After the days of the New Testament, the first notice we have of Christian worship is in the letters of the heathen PLINY [q.v.], and we get additional particulars from JUSTIN MARTYR [q.v.], who tells how in his time, "on the day called the Day of the Sun," the Christians meet to read the Gospels and the Prophets, how a sermon is preached exhorting to holy living, how prayer is said, to which the people respond with loud "Amena," and how the Sacrament is distributed to those present and sent to the sick, and a collection is made for the poor. There is no doubt that the Holy Communion was regarded as the highest and most essential act of Christian worship, and we have given in its place an account of the earliest forms which have come down to us of that service. The liturgical use of the Old Testament Psalms is also a clear fact, and there is little doubt that distinctive Christian hymns also were in use from the beginning. The addition of these from age to age to the treasures of Church worship, forms a very striking and beautiful chapter of religious history. [Hymns; Music.]

Tastes will no doubt vary as to the admissibility of complicated music in public worship. On the one hand there are those who hold that no music should be used in the church but such as all the congregation can join in, while others maintain that, while some music should undoubtedly be of this character, so that all may be enabled to join, it is not inconsistent with the true spirit of worship that the congregation should listen to an anthem. If the thoughts are elevated and calmed by listening to such a strain as Handel's "Comfort ye," this may fairly be called "edification" such as St. Paul bade us seek. We have heard it said especially of the Nicene Creed, that to sing it is like singing a proposition of Euclid, to which it was responded that this Creed is verily a magnificent hymn, and that men can listen to it devoutly in the same spirit that they can look at a picture of the Crucifixion, or listen to the narrative of the event solemnly read. Christian people, however much their tastes and prejudices may vary, will find themselves drawn closely together in spirit so long as they pay earnest heed to the great Apostle's exhortations, "Let all things be done to edifying," and "Let all things be done decently and in order."

Worshipping of Angels.—It has often been asserted that the Jews used to implore the intercession of angels, the text quoted in support of this statement being Gen. xlviii. 16, and in some Jewish commentaries the writers say that invocation of angels was allowed. But modern Jewish writers declare that the angel referred to in this passage was no other than Christ, and they absolutely deny that worship of any kind is given to angels. We find St. Paul warning some of his converts against it, notably the Colossians, which shows that the practice was already beginning to show itself; and all through the days of the early Church the different writers, such as Augustine and Irenæus, are constantly uttering protests; and the Council of Laodicea put forth this Canon: "Christians ought not to forsake the Church of God and go aside and hold conventicles, to invoke or call upon the names of angels; which things are forbidden. If any one, therefore, be found to exercise himself in this private idolatry, let him be accursed: because he hath forsaken our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and gone over to idolatry." The Roman Catholics, nevertheless, are taught to ask the angels to intercede for them, and Zech. i. 12 is quoted in defence. But Protestants hold that this by no means justifies them in addressing prayers to the angels; and that the prayers offered by the four-and-twenty elders [Rev. v. 8], another passage constantly quoted, are their own and not those of the Church.

Wotton, Sir Henry, scholar and poet, (b. at Boughton-Malherbe, Kent, 1588; d. at Eton, 1639), was educated at Winchester, and New College, Oxford, afterwards removed to Queen's College in 1606, and took his M.A.; here he gave some Latin lectures, and won great applause from the professors for the knowledge which they displayed. He became the friend and pupil of Albericus Gentili, then Professor of Civil Law at Oxford, who taught him mathematics, and gave him a thorough instruction in the Italian language. He travelled in France, Germany, and Italy for nine years, studying various arts and sciences, and making the acquaintance of many of the most learned men of the age. After his return to England he became to be excommunicated; but, owing to the death of King Edward III., which occurred in this year, Parliament was prorogued before having given its consent. The Bull was, therefore, sent to Oxford with instructions to the authorities to see that the conditions were carried into effect. The University asked time for consideration, and ended by taking no notice of the Bull. The matter then fell into the hands of the Bishops, who showed themselves more anxious to put a stop to Wycliffe's teaching, and in April, 1378, he was summoned to appear at Lambeth. He had no influential supporters with him; but a throng of citizens, who had been led to adopt the new doctrines, would not allow the sentence of excommunication to be passed. They shouted out continually, "The Pope's briefs shall have no effect in England without the King's consent;" and they proved themselves so powerful that the Archbishop was obliged to dismiss Wycliffe with only a warning against preaching obnoxious doctrine. The schism in the Court of Rome, when Urban VI. reigned in Rome and Clement VII. at Avignon, shocked many faithful Catholics, and the result was a greater inclination to listen to the teaching of Wycliffe. He had now begun to attack the evils of monasticism. In order to make a firm opposition to the various orders of Preaching Friars, Wycliffe started a school at Oxford for graduates, whom he taught himself, and then sent them to all parts of the country. These "poor preachers," as they were called, had no power to sell pardons, or take confessions, but simply went from village to village preaching and visiting the sick. At the same time Wycliffe was writing several tracts on the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation, which he had come to look upon as erroneous, and was also preparing for his translation of the Bible. The New Testament was ready first, and this part is entirely his own work. The Old, which followed soon after, was brought out under his eye; but the actual translation of some parts was done by a faithful follower of his—Nicholas Hereford. By this time he had a large number of followers, and a Romanist chronicler writes: "A man could not meet two people on the road but one of them was a disciple of Wycliffe." He was now ill and broken in health, so he retired to his quiet village of Lutterworth, where he died. The Council of Constance in 1415 declared his writings to be heretical, and commanded that "his body and bones, if they could be distinguished from those of the faithful, should be disinterred and cast away from consecrated ground." This decree was disregarded for thirteen years, but at the end of that time was carried into effect by express command of the Pope. The bones were burnt and thrown into the river Swift. "Thus," says Thomas Fuller, "this brook did convey his ashes into Avon, the Avon into the Severn, the Severn into the narrow sea, and this into the wide ocean. And so the ashes of Wycliffe are the emblem of his doctrine, which is now dispersed all the world over."

Wykeham, WILLIAM OF. [WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM.]

Wynwaloe, St., Abbot, born in the fifth century in Brittany, of pious Welsh parents, who consecrated him to God from his birth. He was placed in the monastery of St. Budoc, in the island of Brehat; under him he made such progress that he was sent at the head of eleven other monks to lay the foundation of a new monastery. For this purpose they chose Landevenec, near Brest, and here they lived in great austerity. In 818 their Order was united with that of St. Benedict. St. Wynwaloe died in 529 at an advanced age, just after celebrating the mass. March 3rd is the day on which he is commemorated. He was buried in his own church, but when Brittany was ravaged by the Normans, his relics were removed from place to place, and are now at Ghent and Montreuil. We have given his name as known in England; in Brittany he is called Guignole or Venole; in Picardy, Vignevalley or Walovay, and in other parts of France, Guingalois.

Wythburga, St., daughter of Annas, King of East Anglia, sister to SAINT ETHELBURGA [q.v.]. She led an austere life, first at Holkham, and afterwards at Dereham, in Norfolk, where she laid the foundation of a church and nunnery, but did not live till their completion. She died in 743, and in 974 her relics were translated to Ely, and buried near those of her sisters

Xavier, FRANCIS.—One of the noblest names in the history of missionary enterprise. He was born April 7th, 1506, in Castle Xavier, Navarre. His father was a nobleman at the Court of the King of Navarre; his mother, the beautiful heiress of the Xavier family. Both parents were pious as well as wise. Francis was their youngest son, and as he grew up was behind none of his brothers in athletic accomplishments. But he soon announced his intention of becoming a scholar, and at the age of seventeen was sent to the college of St. Barbara at Paris. He showed the strength of his resolution, for he took the first place in each study to which he applied himself, whilst he still enjoyed the pleasures and excitements of bodily exercise. When he was twenty he became Professor of Philosophy at Beauvais, and soon won for himself a high name. After he had been there a year and a half his classes were attended by a new pupil, mean-looking, lame, uncouth, slovenly. He was older than Xavier, and in spite of his mean appearance seemed to have that in him which called for respect. His name was Ignatius Loyola. Xavier did not like him, but the pupil seemed much attracted to his master, and gradually gained an influence over him which he used in the endeavour to wean him from his merry and pleasure-loving life. As often as Xavier spoke of any amusement Loyola responded with the question, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain," etc. Xavier at first treated this as one of his pupil's eccentricities, but at length, after some five years' intercourse, yielded himself altogether to the new influence, especially as his pleasure-hunting life had involved him in difficulties out of which Loyola had helped him. The latter then proceeded to tell him his own previous history. [LOYOLA.] And thus the order of things became reversed, and Xavier became the pupil of Ignatius Loyola, and entered heartily into his scheme for the foundation of his new Order. The history of this Order belongs elsewhere. [JESUITS.] Xavier and his friend were ordained in 1534, and desired to go to evangelise Palestine, but it was not until seven years after that the Pope's doubts as to their usefulness were removed.

During these years, however, Xavier's labours seem to have been wonderful. He preached in one Italian town after another from church steps and market-crosses, by roadsides and in crowded fairs, and, when not so occupied, learned nursing in hospitals, or studied artisan labour, such as might be turned to account in distant lands.

At length on April 7th, 1541, he set sail for the East Indies, in friar's frock, crucifix on his heart, Bible and Breviary in his hands. All the time of the voyage he made the ship his parish, preached as often as he might, prayed with the crew, and both by day and night for them. The ship wintered at Mozambique, and Xavier, whilst ministering in the hospital there, caught a malignant fever, which nearly cost him his life. On May 6th, 1542, he arrived at Goa, the Portuguese capital of India. There was a nominally Christian colony there, even a bishop, but of real religion there seemed none. The Portuguese were frightfully profligate, and the natives who had been made converts had in disgust fallen back for the most part into heathenism. But Xavier knew Who was on his side, and addressed himself to what many men would have regarded as a hopeless task. He resolved to reform the colonists first, went in and out of hospitals, and begged almost from door to door for the sick. Then he got a bell, and rang it through the streets like a crier, until he had gathered an audience to whom to preach. "Parents," he would cry, "I have a message to you; send me your children, and I will teach them how to be obedient; send me your slaves and I will teach them how to serve you more faithfully. Come to me yourselves, for I have glad tidings of great joy to you. But now send me your children." The children came, and he addressed them: "Come, my children, that I may tell you of One who loves you dearly, who has prepared for you in His own beautiful country a home of joys past all understanding. I will tell you the way to it. I will tell you also stories of that same good Lord, who was once a little child like you, and all that He did and suffered for your sakes." So a year passed. Many of the evildoers hated his solemn speech about the judgment to come, but the children all loved him, and the simple holiness of his life and his burning eloquence began to tell effectually upon the parents. Morals sensibly improved at Goa under his ministry. But a call came to him to visit the pearl-fishers 600 miles away, a miserable race who had been baptised, but then left alone, no one willing to go near them. Among these he settled himself, lived as they did, on rice, preached to them by signs till he could learn their language, taught them to read and write, and persuaded them to build themselves chapels. Writing to Ignatius Loyola he poured forth his delight at the success he was receiving. Then he returned to Goa, and having organised a college for native teachers there, he returned to the pearl-fishers with a staff of helpers. He found his poor flock in dreadful misery. A neighbouring tribe had attacked them, and carried off all their substance. Hundreds had died of starvation, and the rest were homeless. He sent to the nearest station for provisions, which he distributed among the sufferers, whilst he resumed his simple life among them. Each morning he called them to worship, all day he taught the children, visited the sick, or went into neighbouring villages; at twilight he once more called them to worship, then he betook himself to study and prayer far into the night. He only took three and a half hours of sleep. After a while, leaving some of his companions there, he pushed on to the kingdom of Travancore, and in one month baptised 10,000 persons. The people, on his persuasion, destroyed their idols, and built thirty churches. The angry Brahmins waylaid him with arrows and burned down houses that he frequented, but the people, who called him "the great father," organised themselves into a perpetual body-guard to protect him, and the work of evangelising still prospered. He next fixed on Malacca as a centre of labour, choosing it because it was (as it is still) the great mart between India, China and Japan. He thought that it was "the wickedest place in the world." Again he was seen with his bell morning and evening, calling with a loud voice on his hearers to "pray for those who were living in sin." But he was not to remain here long. He made a convert of a young Japanese named Angerso, who entreated him to go and work in Japan. It was 3,000 miles off, but Xavier, having left five friends newly arrived from Europe to carry on his work, arrived in Japan in August, 1549, though friends had warned him that he would be surely put to death. He had learned Japanese on the voyage. He found the people, as St. Paul had found the Athenians, very sharp-witted and clever, but wholly given to idolatry. Christianity was entirely unknown. When he had made a few converts he placed them in charge of Angerso, whom he had baptised by the name of Paul, and went on through the country barefooted, with a staff, a mat, and a wallet, and the sacred vessels, as his only possessions. He had never suffered so much privation as here, and never was so happy. Conversion everywhere followed his preaching. Persecuted in one city he fled to another, and still God visibly blessed his labours. He built chapels and ordained elders, and at length left a flourishing mission, and returned to Malacca in 1552, full of an even greater project than he had yet undertaken. This was to attempt the conversion of China.

But at Malacca he found a plague raging, and with magnificent skill as well as courage he used his medical knowledge so well that soon the sickness abated, for he put heart into the terror-stricken. But on applying for a convoy to China he failed. The Portuguese feared the loss of trade, and would not give him a passage. When at length he obtained a small ship at an exorbitant price, they found it out and stopped him. He contrived, indeed, to reach Sancian, an island opposite Macao, but he could get no further. Whilst he was still looking for fresh opportunities he was seized with fever, and, foreseeing his approaching end, he was taken to the ship's hospital; but finding his prayers hindered here, he begged to be taken back to the shore. A sailor put up a rough tent of tarpauling to shelter him from the burning sun, and left him. There untended, alone with the Good Shepherd, he died on the 2nd of December, 1552. His body was carried to Goa for burial.

Xerophagia [Gr. xeros, "dry," and phagō. "I eat"].—The name given to a fast kept by the early Church during the six days of Holy Week, in which nothing was eaten but bread and salt, though afterwards pulse, herbs, and fruit were added. This fast was not compulsory, and we find the Church condemning the Montanists, who not only made it so but also added other fasts.

Ximenes de Cisneros, FRANCIS, Cardinal, a celebrated Spanish ecclesiastic and statesman, was born at Torrelaguna in Castile in 1436, died 1517. He was educated at Alcalá de Henares, Salamanca, and Rome, where he obtained from the Pope a prospective nomination as Prebendary in Toledo Cathedral. The Archbishop refused to allow the claim, and, when Ximenes persisted in it, put him into prison, where he remained for six years. On his release, in 1480, he was made Vicar-General to Cardinal Mendoza, Bishop of Sigüenza. He showed great administrative talent, but, in 1482, suddenly gave up his office and entered a Franciscan monastery at Toledo; but becoming famed for his asceticism, retired to a lonely monastery at Castañar. In 1492 he was recalled to become Confessor to Queen Isabella, over whom he gained great influence, and three years after she appointed him Archbishop of Toledo, which post he refused till ordered to accept it by the Pope. This preferment was, next to the Papacy, the richest in the Church; but Ximenes, though obliged openly to maintain great splendour, lived privately with as great asceticism as when a monk, and devoted the whole of the revenues of his See to charitable and religious purposes. In his seventieth year Pope Julius II. gave him a cardinal's hat. On the death of King Ferdinand, in 1516, he became Regent till the arrival of Charles V., and died on the way to meet him at Bozaguillas, near Aranda de Duero, in 1517. Ximenes held extreme views, and was a strong Ultramontanist. He was Grand Inquisitor of Spain, and strongly opposed the translation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue on the principle of not giving holy things to the profane. He was harsh in his measures towards the Moors, and it was by his advice that they were finally ordered to leave Spain in 1492. But he was sincere and patriotic, and clear of all suspicion of self-aggrandisement in his public life. He founded the University of Alcalá, and, assisted by other eminent scholars, undertook the grand Complutensian Polyglot. [POLYGLOT, COMPLUTENSIAN.]

Year, THE ECCLESIASTICAL.—The Christian Year is that arrangement of seasons which commemorates one by one the great facts in the life of Christ, and the doctrines which spring out of them. Some account of these seasons will be found under their respective headings; it remains for us here to set forth a conspectus of them as a whole.

The first is ADVENT, which commemorates the coming of Christ into the world in His great humility, and also bids us look for His second coming. The two subjects are closely blended together in the Advent services, especially in the Epistles and Gospels. There are four Sundays in Advent, which is followed by Christmas, the great festival of the Incarnation, to which are appended three commemorations, respectively of one who died in missionaries sent over by Gregory the Great with Augustine to convert the Anglo-Saxons. Edwin, King of Northumbria, married Ethelburga, daughter of King Ethelbert of Kent; and Paulinus, being duly consecrated to the Episcopate, accompanied her to her northern home that she might have the free exercise of the Christian religion in which she had been brought up. It was some time before Edwin was converted to Christianity, but at length he and the heathen high-priest Coifi, having listened to Paulinus's story of the Gospel, were so impressed with its truth, that Coifi himself destroyed the great pagan temple at Godmundham; and on Easter Day, 627, Edwin, Coifi, and many nobles were baptised at York, then called Eboracum. The King caused a small stone church to be erected on the place, and this became the forerunner of the present glorious minster. Paulinus then went about preaching through Northumbria, which embraced all the country between the Humber and the Forth and Clyde. He is said to have built a church on the present site of Lincoln Cathedral, and also to have founded the minster of Southwell. Edwin was killed while fighting against Penda in the battle of Hatfield Chase in 633. Ethelburga had to fly for safety to Kent, and she was accompanied by Paulinus, who was shortly after made Bishop of Rochester, where he died in 644. Northumbria under these untoward circumstances fell back into Paganism. Oswald, the grandson of Edwin, on regaining his kingdom, applied to Iona, in whose monastery he had learned Christianity, to send him some monks to evangelise his people. Accordingly, in 635 St. Aidan was consecrated Bishop and sent over, the small island of Lindisfarne being given to him as his episcopal seat. [AIDAN, ST.; LINDISFARNE.] On Aidan's death, in 651, another monk, Finan, from Iona, filled his place; then Colman, 661, and Tuda, 664; but these must be regarded as bishops of the Northern Province, and not of Northumbria as a whole. In 664 the famous St. WILFRID [q.v.] was chosen Bishop of Northumbria, and went to Gaul to be consecrated; during his absence of three years King Oswy appointed Sr. CHAD [q.v.]; but on Wilfrid's return he resigned the See, and was soon after appointed by Archbishop Theodore to the See of Mercia [LICHFIELD]. [For the division of the See in Wilfrid's time by Theodore see WILFRID, ST.; LINDISFARNE; HEXHAM; WITHERNE.] John, called also St. John of Beverley, from his having founded that monastery, became Bishop of York in 705; he is one of the most famous of northern saints, and was the pupil of St. HILDA [q.v.]. He was canonised in 1037 by Benedict IX. Egbert [732-766] was the first Archbishop of York, receiving the pall in 735 from Gregory III., and all other bishops of the Northern Province were considered as his suffragans. He wrote several books, the chief one being a

Pontifical; or, Book of Episcopal Offices. Bede's Ecclesiastical History was dedicated to him. He founded the School of York and the library connected with it. ALCUIN [q.v.] was educated in this school. From 812 to 928 little is known of the ecclesiastical history of York beyond the record of the names of its prelates. Then came Wulstan, appointed to the See by Athelstan; but he afterwards allied himself to the Danes. In 956 we find both Archbishops to be men of Danish blood—Odo of Canterbury and Oskytel of York. In 972 came St. OSWALD [q.v.], who was also Bishop of Worcester. Aldred [1060-1069] held at various times the Sees of Sherborne, Hereford, and Worcester. He was the first English bishop who made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In 1066 he crowned Harold, but transferred his allegiance to the Conqueror, whom he also crowned at Westminster. Next in 1069 came the first Norman Bishop, Thomas of Bayeux; he and Lanfranc disputed as to the supremacy of Canterbury over York. It was decided that the northern archbishops should swear allegiance to Canterbury and be consecrated in Canterbury Cathedral. The minster of York had been destroyed by fire in the devastation caused by the Conqueror; this, Thomas rebuilt and completely reorganised, appointing archdeacons to assist him in the supervision of the clergy. He re-established the Benedictines, and restored Whitby Abbey and St. Mary's, of York. Thurstan [1114-1140] was a remarkable man, the great restorer of monastic discipline and organisation in the north. For five years the dispute between Canterbury and York was renewed. Thurstan refused to acknowledge the supremacy of Canterbury, and went to Rome to get the matter settled. Pope Calixtus II. consecrated him there, and on his return to York Henry I. was furious and dispossessed him of all the property belonging to the See; but in 1119 the Pope determined that York should be freed from all submission to Canterbury, and published a Bull to that effect. Thurstan took part in the battle of the Standard in 1138. Six new Augustinian houses were founded in Yorkshire in his time, and he introduced the Cistercians into the north, founding the abbeys of Rievaulx and Fountains, the latter on his own property. William Fitz-Herbert [1140], known as St. William of York, was Archbishop but a short time; he was canonised on account of his supposed murder by the mixture of poison in the chalice, and of miracles said to be wrought at his tomb. Roger de Pont l'Evêque [1154-1181] was a great politician; it is said to have been through his representations of Becket's conduct that Henry uttered the words which caused St. Thomas's murder. He rebuilt the choir of his minster and his palace at York. Geoffery Plantagenet, an illegitimate son of Henry II., held the archbishopric from 1191-1207. In that year he fled from John, who 1516; died at Heidelberg, 1590. He entered the Order of the Regular Canons at the Lateran in 1531, but having studied the writings of the German Reformers, he embraced their doctrines, and, in consequence, was obliged to flee from Italy. He went to Heidelberg, where he taught divinity. He was particularly attached to the doctrines of Calvin, and in 1560 took a zealous and assiduous part in the great controversy at Strasburg between Zwingli and Calvin on the doctrine of Predestination. In 1572 he also bore an energetic part in the Anti-Trinitarian controversy, and wrote De tribus Elohim. His theological and controversial works were collected and published in eight volumes at Geneva in 1619.

Zend-Avesta. [PARSEES.]

Zeno, founder of the Stoic Philosophy [q.v.], born in Cyprus, in the latter part of the fourth century before Christ. He is said to have adopted the Cynic doctrine of contempt for riches through having been shipwrecked at the age of thirty, and losing all his property. Coming to Athens, near to which his misfortune happened, he attached himself in turn to the various schools of philosophy there, and at length opened one of his own, in order to set forth the results of his inquiries, and develop his own peculiar system. For this purpose he selected "the Painted Porch" (Stoa) in which to lecture, whence the name "Stoic." And here he held his school, it is said, until his ninety-eighth year. The Athenians honoured him with a golden crown, and gave him a public burial at his death, and his countrymen erected a monument to his honour. And indeed, in spite of its weaknesses and drawbacks, the Stoic philosophy had noble elements in it, inculcating courage, manly energy, endurance, simplicity, reverence for goodness. Much that was noble in the Roman character is to be traced to it, and the finest character among the emperors, Marcus Aurelius, was a Stoic philosopher. None of Zeno's writings, beyond the titles, have been preserved.

Zeno, St., Confessor, Bishop of Verona, supposed to have been by birth a Latin and an African, was consecrated Bishop in 382, in the reign of Julian the Apostate. St. Zeno devoted himself earnestly to the extirpation of heresies, and attacked with great zeal the Arians and Pelagians; he also baptised every year numbers of converts from idolatry. The cause of the Church prospered at Verona under his episcopate to such an extent that people flocked to hear him, and it is said that he had so impressed upon his people the duty of hospitality, that no one ever came to ask alms or to lodge at Verona without being generously entertained. After the defeat of the Romans at Adrianople by the Goths, the victors brought numbers of captives to Verona, who, through the charity and solicitations of the inhabitants, were many of them released or rescued from a cruel death. Mention is made of the numerous ordinations held by St. Zeno, and of the virgins whom he consecrated to God. He died at Verona in 380, on April 12th, on which day he is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology. The works ascribed to Zeno are Sancti Zenonis Episcopi Sermones, and a Catechism.

Zinzendorf, NICOLAUS LUDWIG, COUNT VON.—The founder of the present sect of Moravian Brethren [q.v.] [b. at Dresden, 1700; d. at Herrnhut, Upper Lusatia, 1760]. His father died while Nicolaus was in his infancy, and he was brought up by his grandmother, the Baroness von Gersdorf, who sent him, in 1710, to be educated at Halle, under the care of Francke, the philanthropist. Here he spent six years, displaying much industry and talent in his studies; and he founded among his schoolfellows a religious society, to which he gave the name of Der Orden von Senfkorn, "The Order of the Grain of Mustard-seed." A strong feeling of Pietism was then existing at Halle, and influenced the boy's whole life. He was sent in 1716 to Wittenberg, and afterwards travelled through Holland and France, remaining some time at Paris, but careful to avoid, as far as possible, the temptations of the Court. Upon his return to Dresden he was made a member of the State Council of Saxony; but he had little liking for political life, and retired with his newly married wife to his residence in Upper Lusatia. Here he found a settlement of some of the Moravian Brethren, who had fled thither from persecution, and to whom he gave permission to build a house on his estate, which was afterwards increased, and called the Herrnhut, "Tabernacle of the Lord." Zinzendorf now devoted all his spare time to furthering the welfare of the sect, for whom he wrote hymns, preached, and translated the Scriptures. In 1734 he was ordained a minister of the Lutheran Church; but was banished from Saxony two years later, on a charge of introducing new and strange doctrines. He went to Holland, and there founded a Moravian colony. He was made Bishop of the Moravians, and founded colonies in Livonia and Esthonia. In 1737 he came to England, and made the acquaintance of John and Charles Wesley, and in 1741 he went to North America, where he founded the colony of Bethlehem. He returned to Herrnhut in 1747, and remained there till his death, with a few interruptions for missionary work in North America. Zinzendorf wrote numerous works both in prose and verse, and composed many hymns for the use of the Moravian Congregation; his writings abound in passages of deep thought and beauty, but occasionally become incoherent in their mysticism.

there were no less than six men of that name ; others have identified him with Moses, Elijah, Esdras, and the servant of Ezekiel. It is said that he was a great magician and astrologer.

Zosimus, POPE [417-418], was by birth a Greek. Celestius, a disciple of Pelagius, who had been condemned by Pope Innocent I. and the African Bishops at a synod at Carthage in 412, made his appeal from that Council to the See of Rome. He came to Rome in the beginning of Zosimus's popedom, hoping to prepossess him in his favour by lodging the final issue of the cause in his hands. Zosimus convened a synod in St. Clement's Church to examine the articles of impeachment against Celestius, who presented a confession of faith renouncing the heterodoxy with which he was charged ; and Zosimus wrote to the African Bishops, first to ask them to reconsider the matter, and secondly to pronounce Pelagius and Celestius innocent and acquitted. But the Bishops ultimately proved to the Pope that he had been deceived, and he summoned Celestius to appear before him and renounce in plainer and more decisive terms the errors with which he was accused ; but instead of coming he ran away from Rome, and Zosimus then confirmed the sentence of his predecessor.

Zwingli, ULRICH, the celebrated Swiss Reformer, was born in 1484, at Wildhaus, in St. Gall ; died in 1531. He was educated at Basle, Berne, and Vienna, where he studied philosophy, and then returned to Basle to study theology under Thomas Wyttenbach. He was ordained priest in 1506, and was appointed pastor of Glarus. Here he stayed for ten years and learned Greek, studied the Scriptures in the Hebrew and Greek text and the early Fathers, also the writings of Wycliffe, John Huss, etc. He seems early to have realised the many abuses of the Church, and in his sermons always avoided the subjects of the invocation of saints, images, pilgrimages, etc. At that time many of the Swiss people were hired out to foreign countries as mercenaries, and Zwingli attended as chaplain when they fought with the Italians against the French. On his return to Switzerland he remonstrated with the Government against the practice. In 1516 he was invited as preacher in the monastery of Einsiedeln, famous for its pilgrimages. Here he stayed for nearly three years, preaching more freely than at Glarus against indulgences and other abuses, and calling on the Bishops of Constance and Sitten to reform them. In 1518, Luther, of whom Zwingli had never heard, affixed his theses against indulgences against the doors of the Wittenberg church. Bernardin Samson, a Franciscan friar, commissioned to sell indulgences in Switzerland, appeared in Einsiedeln. He told the people that not only would the indulgences remit the guilt of past sins, but would procure also an immunity for future sins that they might commit. He was opposed by Zwingli, who refused him admittance to the Abbey, and preached to those assembled against the glaring abuses made of indulgences. The Reformer was upheld by Faber, Vicar of the Bishop of Constance, who forbade Samson to sell indulgences within the diocese.

Meantime he had been invited to become preacher in the cathedral of Zurich, a post which he accepted on the condition that he might preach the pure Gospel. He preached his first sermon on January 1st, 1519, and, a few months after, Samson, arriving at the gates, found his old enemy there and was refused admittance. Having successfully preached against indulgences, Zwingli now turned his attention to other matters, as—the number of external forms in worship, the need of clear religious instruction and of services in the vernacular tongue, etc. He corresponded on the subject with Capito, Ecolampadius, Bullinger, Wyttenbach, Haller, etc., and in 1522 the first steps towards the Reformation in Switzerland were made. The Bishop of Constance and the monks accused Zwingli of sedition and impiety, so, in 1522, he wrote a defence called Apologeticus Architeles. In January, 1523, the Legislative Council of Zurich called together a conference at the town-hall, to which were invited all the ecclesiastics of the canton. Sixty-seven Articles of Faith were discussed, as—Papal authority, celibacy of the clergy, auricular confession, purgatory. All these, which are the chief subjects in which the Swiss Reformers differed from the Roman Church, were declared by Zwingli to be contrary to the teaching of the Bible. His chief opponent was John Faber, afterwards Bishop of Ravenna. Six hundred clergy and laity were present, who decided that "Zwingli having neither been convicted of heresy nor refuted, should continue to preach the Gospel as before ; that the pastors of the town and territory of Zurich should ground their discourses on the words of Scripture alone, and that both parties should avoid all personal reflections and recriminations." Thus the old religion remained for the present unchanged ; but some of Zwingli's followers, in their zeal, destroyed a crucifix which stood at one of the gates of Zurich. Zwingli was blamed for it, and returned answer that they had committed violence, but had done no sacrilege, as images ought not to be worshipped. This led to a second conference, held in October, 1523, in which Zwingli, before 900 people, maintained that the worship of images was unauthorised, and that the Mass ought not to be retained. He was again victorious, and early in 1524 all pictures and statues were removed from the churches. In the same year Zwingli married, a full year before Martin Luther.

Early in 1525 Mass was finally abolished, and
